radiate (rā′di-āt), a. and n. [< L. radiatus, having rays, radiating, pp. of radiare, radiate, furnish with spokes: see radiate, v.] I. a. 1. Having a ray, rays, or ray-like parts; having lines or projections proceeding from a common center or surface; rayed: as, a radiate animal (a member of the Radiata); a radiate mineral (one with rayed crystals or fibers); a radiate flower-head. Specifically—(a) In zoöl.: (1) Characterized by or exhibiting radial symmetry, or radiation; having the whole structure, or some parts of it, radiating from a common center; radiatory; rayed; actinomeric. (2) Of or pertaining to the Cuvierian Radiata: as, "the radiate mob," Huxley. (b) In bot., bearing ray-flowers: said chiefly of a head among the Compositæ, in which a disk of tubular florets is encircled by one or more rows of radially spreading ligulate florets, as in the daisy and sunflower; or in which all the florets are ligulate, as in the dandelion and chicory.

Radiate Structure.—Wavellite.

2. Constituting a ray or rays; proceeding or extending outward from a center or focus; radiating: as, the radiate fibers of some minerals and plants; the radiate petals of a flower or florets of a head.

A school-house plant on every hill, Stretching in radiate nerve-lines thence
The quick wires of intelligence.
Whittier, Snow-Bound.

3. In numismatic and similar descriptions, represented with rays proceeding from it, as a head or bust: as, the head of the Emperor Caracalla, radiate; the head of Helios (the sun-god), radiate.

Radiate Head of Gallienus.—From an aureus in the British Museum. (Four times the size of the original.)

The sun-god Helios rising from the sea, showing radiate head. (Metope from New Ilium in the Troad.)

II. n. 1. A ray-like projection; a ray.

The tin salt crystallised out in transparent, shining needles, arranged in clusters of radiates about nuclei.
Amer. Chem. Jour., XI. 82.

2. A member of the Radiata, in any sense.

radiated (rā′di-ā-ted), p. a. [< radiate + -ed[2].] Same as radiate.—Radiated animals. See Radiata.—Radiated falcon. See falcon.—Radiated wing-cells, in entom., wing-cells formed principally by diverging nervures, as in the earwig.

radiately (rā′di-āt-li), adv. In a radiate manner; with radiation from a common center; radially.—Radiately veined or nerved, in bot., same as palmately veined or nerved. See nervation.

radiateness (rā′di-āt-nes), n. Same as radiality.

radiate-veined (rā′di-āt-vānd), a. In bot., palmately veined. See nervation.

radiatiform (rā-di-ā′ti-fôrm), a. [< L. radiatus, radiate, + forma, form.] In bot., having the appearance of being radiate: said of heads, as in some species of Centaurea, having some of the marginal flowers enlarged, but not truly ligulate.

radiatingly (rā′di-ā-ting-li), adv. Same as ★radiately.

radiation (rā-di-ā′shon), n. [< F. radiation = Sp. radiación = Pg. radiação = It. radiazione, < L. radiatio(n-), shining, radiation, < radiare, shine, radiate: see radiate.] 1. The act of radiating, or the state of being radiated; specifically, emission and diffusion of rays, as of rays of light or heat, or of X-rays. Physically speaking, radiation is the transformation of the molecular energy of a hot body—that is, any body above the absolute zero (−273° C.)—into the wave-motion of the surrounding ether, and the propagation of these ether waves through space. Hence, every body is the source of radiation, but the character of the radiation varies, depending chiefly upon the temperature of the body; it is called luminous or obscure, according as it is or is not capable of exciting the sensation of light. Compare radiant energy, heat, light[1], radiator. See the supplement.

Radiation is the communication of vibratory motion to the ether, and when a body is said to be chilled by radiation, as for example the grass of a meadow on a starlight night, the meaning is that the molecules of the grass have lost a portion of their motion, by imparting it to the medium in which they vibrate. Tyndall, Radiation, § 2.

Any substance . . . will become heated by radiation to the greatest degree when its surface is made rough and completely black, so that it can absorb all the rays falling upon it. Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 198.

2. The divergence or shooting forth of rays from a point or focus.—3. In zoöl., the structural character of a radiate; the radiate condition, quality, or type; the radiate arrangement of parts. Also radiism.—Direct radiation and indirect radiation, phrases used in describing the method of heating by steam-radiators, according as the radiator is actually in the room heated or is inclosed in a space beneath, from which the hot air is distributed by tin pipes, as in simple heating by a hot-air furnace. In both cases the heat is communicated by convection, and in the case of indirect radiation not at all by radiation. —Dynamic radiation, a phrase introduced by Tyndall to describe the radiation of a gas when the heat is not due to an outside source, but is developed by the molecular motion as the gas passes rapidly into an exhausted vessel.—Solar radiation, the radiation of the sun as measured by the heat which the earth receives from it. —Terrestrial radiation, the communication of heat by the earth to the surrounding ether, by means of radiation.

radiative (rā′di-ā-tiv), a. [< radiate + -ive.] Having a tendency to radiate; possessing the quality of radiation.—Radiative or radiating power, the ability of a body to radiate heat—that is, physically, to transform its own heat-energy into the wave-motion of the surrounding ether. It depends, other things being equal, upon the nature of the surface of the body, being a maximum for lampblack and a minimum for polished metallic surfaces: thus, a mass of hot water will cool more rapidly in a vessel with a dull-black surface than in one which is polished and bright, like silver. The radiative and absorbing powers of a substance are identical, and are the opposite of the reflecting power. ★Also called emissive power.

radiator (rā′di-ā-tor), n. [< radiate + -or[1].] 1. A source of radiation; a body or substance from which energy is given off by means of ether-waves. The term is usually confined to cases in which the vibrating parts of the radiator are of molecular dimensions and the resulting radiation is of the wave-lengths included in the spectrum (about 0.00001 cm. to 0.05 cm.). Devices for producing electromagnetic waves, such as the Hertz vibrator, and radioactive substances the energy emanating from which is not in the form of waves, are, however, sometimes called 'radiators.' All forms of matter radiate to some extent at all temperatures above the absolute zero, the intensity of radiation increasing rapidly as the temperature rises. The radiating power of a body depends upon its absorbing power, the universal law being that a body emits those wave-lengths which it is capable of absorbing and no others, and that radiation and absorption are always proportional. Reflecting power and transparency, therefore, are incompatible with high radiating power, and the best possible radiator would be a substance reflecting nothing and absorbing all radiation falling upon it. Such a radiator is called the ideal black body. While no such substance actually exists, a close approximation to its radiation, both as to character and amount, is afforded by the radiation from a small hole in an otherwise entirely closed, hollow, opaque vessel, and such devices are used as standards of radiation. Radiators coated with platinum-black, lampblack, or iron oxid, approach the ideal black body in radiating power within a few per cent. A black body radiates in proportion to the fourth power of its temperature. It gives a continuous spectrum the maximum intensity of which is of a wave-length which varies with the temperature. At 20° C. the maximum lies between 9 and 10 μ; at the temperature of the acetylene flame (1,900° C.), it lies at 1.05 μ, while in the sun's spectrum the maximum of energy is at 0.5 μ. Wave-lengths within the limits of the visible spectrum attain sufficient intensity to affect the eye—but not to produce the sense of color—at about 400° C. Color sensation begins at about 500° C. The colors of highest luminosity, yellow and green, appear first.

2. A part of a heating apparatus designed to communicate heat to a room, chiefly by convection, but partly, in some cases, by radiation.

radiatory (rā′di-ā-tō-ri), a. [< radiate + -ory.] Radiating; having parts arranged like rays ★around a center or axis; rayed; actinomeric.

radical (rad′i-kal), a. and n. [< F. radical = Pr. Sp. Pg. radical = It. radicale = D. radikaal = G. Sw. Dan. radikal, < LL. radicalis, of or pertaining to the root, having roots, radical, < L. radix (radic-), root: see radix.] I. a. 1. Pertaining or relating to a root or to roots.

The cause of a thynne and watery radycall moyster to suche thynges as drawe theyr nuryshement therof. R. Eden, tr. of Gonzalus Oviedus (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 227).

Specifically—(a) In bot., belonging to the root: opposed to cauline. See radical leaves and radical peduncle, below. (b) In philol., of the nature of or pertaining to a root, or a primary or underived word or main part of a word: as, a radical word; a radical letter or syllable; radical accentuation. (c) In math., consisting of or indicating one of the roots of a number: as, a radical expression; the radical sign. (d) In chem., noting any atom or group of atoms which is, for the moment, regarded as a chief constituent of the molecules of a given compound, and which does not lose its integrity in the ordinary chemical reactions to which the substance is liable. Cooke, Chem. Philos., p. 106.

2. Making part of the essential nature of the subject or thing concerned; existing inherently; intrinsic; organic: as, radical defects of character; a radical fault of construction; the radical principles of an art or of religion. The Latin word first occurs, about the beginning of the thirteenth century, in the phrase humidum radicale, or radical moisture, that moisture in an animal or a plant which cannot be expelled without killing the organism which was supposed to remain unchanged throughout life, and to be the chief principle of vitality. The word seems to translate the pseudo-Aristotelian ὡς ἄν εἴποι τις ῥίζαι, 'as one may say, roots'—an expression applied to moisture and certain other conditions as being essential to the life of plants.

Radicall moisture, or first or naturall moisture, spred like a dew thorow all the parts of the bodie, wherewith such parts are nourished: which moisture, being once wasted, can neuer be restored. Minsheu.

Whilst thus my sorrow-wasting soul was feeding
Upon the radical humour of her thought.
Quarles, Emblems, iv. 12.

This radical error . . . has contributed more than any other cause to prevent the formation of popular constitutional governments. Calhoun, Works, I. 30.

3. Of or pertaining to the root or foundation of the subject; concerned with or based upon fundamental principles; hence, thoroughgoing; extreme: as, a radical truth; a radical difference of opinion; radical views or measures; the Radical party in British politics.

His works . . . are more radical in spirit and tendency than any others, for they strike at all cant whatever, whether it be the cant of monarchy or the cant of democracy. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 147.

4. [cap.] Of or pertaining to a political party or body of persons known as Radicals (see II., 4, below): as, a Radical candidate; the Radical program.—Radical axis of two circles. See axis[1].—Radical bass, in music, same as fundamental bass (which see, under fundamental).—Radical cadence, in music, a cadence consisting of chords in their original position.—Radical center of three circles in a plane, the intersection of the three radical axes of the three pairs of the three circles.—Radical curve. See curve.—Radical expression, an expression containing radical signs, especially a quantity expressed as a root of another. Sometimes loosely called a radical quantity.—Radical function. See function.—Radical leaves, leaves springing from the root, or, properly, from a part of the stem near to and resembling the root. In many herbs (primrose, dandelion, etc.) all or nearly all the leaves are thus clustered at the base of the stem. See cuts under Hieracium and Ornithogalum.—Radical moisture†. See above, def. 2. —Radical peduncle, a peduncle that proceeds from the axil of a radical leaf, as in the primrose and cowslip.—Radical pitch, the pitch or tone with which the utterance of a syllable begins.—Radical plane, the plane of intersection of two spheres other than the plane at infinity, whether the circle of intersection be real or not.—Radical sign the sign $\surd$ (a modified form of the letter r, the initial of Latin radix, root), placed before any quantity, denoting that its root is to be extracted: thus, $\surd a$ or $\surd a+b$. To distinguish the particular root, a number is written over the sign: thus, $\sqrt[3]{\ }$, $\sqrt[4]{\ }$, $\sqrt[5]{\ }$, etc., denote respectively the square root, cube root, fourth root, etc. In the case of the square root, however, the number is usually omitted, and merely the sign written. The same sign is much used to mark a so-called root or radical element of words.—Radical stress, in elocution, the force of utterance falling on the initial part of a syllable or word.

Radical Axes and Radical Center.

= Syn. 3. There may be a distinction between a radical reform, change, cure, or the like, and one that is thorough, entire, complete, or thoroughgoing, radical emphasizing only the fact of going to the root, whether there is thoroughness or entireness or not. Yet that which is radical is likely to be thorough, etc.

II. n. 1. In philol.: (a) A radical word or part of a word; especially, a primitive word or verbal element serving as a root of inflected or derivative words. (b) A radical letter; a letter forming an essential part of the primitive form or root of a word. Also radicle.—2. In chem., an element or group of combined elements which remains after one or more elements have been removed from a compound. (See the quotation.) The term is chiefly applied to compound radicals, which are assumed to exist in compound bodies and to remain intact in many of the chemical changes which these bodies undergo. Thus the compound radical ethyl, C_2H_5, appears in alcohol ($C_2H_5.OH$), in ether ($(C_2H_5)_2O$), in ethylamine ($C_2H_5.NH_2$), etc., and may be transferred without change, like an element, from one of these compounds to the other. Also radicle.

The word radical stands for any atom or group of atoms which is, for the moment, regarded as a chief constituent of the molecules of a given compound, and which does not lose its integrity in the ordinary chemical reactions to which the substance is liable. . . . As a general rule the metallic atoms are basic radicals, while the non-metallic atoms are acid radicals. . . . Among compound radicals those consisting of carbon and hydrogen alone are usually basic, and those containing oxygen also are usually acid. Cooke, Chem. Philos., p. 106.

3. In music, same as root.—4. A person who holds or acts according to radical principles; one who pursues a theory to its furthest apparent limit; an extremist, especially in politics. In the political sense, in which the word has been most used, a Radical is one who aims at thorough reform in government from a liberal or democratic point of view, or desires the establishment of what he regards as abstract principles of right and justice, by the most direct and uncompromising methods. The political Radicals of a country generally constitute the extreme faction or wing of the more liberal of the two leading parties, or act as a separate party when their numbers are sufficient for the exertion of any considerable influence. The name Radical is often applied as one of reproach to the members of a party by their opponents. In the United States it has been so applied at times to Democrats, and to Republicans especially in the South about the period of reconstruction. The French Radicals are often called the Extreme Left. The British Radicals form an important section of the Liberal party.

In politics they [the Independents] were, to use the phrase of their own time, "Root-and-Branch men," or, to use the kindred phrase of our own, Radicals. Macaulay.

He [President Johnson] did not receive a single Southern vote, and was detested through every Southern State with a cordiality unknown in the case of any Northern Radical. The Nation, III. 141.

5. In alg., a quantity expressed as a root of another quantity.—Negative, organic, etc., radical. See the adjectives.

radicalise, v. See radicalize.

radicalism (rad′i-kal-izm), n. [= F. radicalisme = Sp. Pg. It. radicalismo; as radical + -ism.] The state or character of being radical; the holding or carrying out of extreme principles on any subject; specifically, extreme political liberalism; the doctrine or principle of uncompromising reform in government; the system or methods advocated by the political Radicals of a country.

Radicalism endeavours to realize a state more in harmony with the character of the ideal man. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 511.

The year 1769 is very memorable in political history, for it witnessed the birth of English Radicalism, and the first serious attempts to reform and control Parliament by a pressure from without, making its members habitually subservient to their constituents. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xi.

radicality (rad-i-kal′i-ti), n. [< radical + -ity.] 1. The state or character of being radical, in any sense. [Rare.]—2†. Origination.

There may be equivocal seeds and hermaphroditical principles which contain the radicality and power of different forms. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 17.

radicalize (rad′i-kal-īz), v.; pret. and pp. radicalized, ppr. radicalizing. [< radical + -ize.] I. trans. To make radical; cause to conform to radical ideas, or to political radicalism. [Recent.]

It is inferred . . . that Lord Salisbury means to radicalize his land programme for England. New York Tribune, Feb. 18, 1887.

II. intrans. To become radical; adopt or carry out radical principles, or the doctrines of political radicalism. [Recent.]

Indeed, it is hard to say which is the more surprising—the goodwill shown by the Russians, and even by the Russian Government, for a radicalising Republic, or the fatuous admiration of certain French Republicans for the most autocratic State in Europe. Contemporary Rev., LIII. 803.

Also spelled radicalise.

radically (rad′i-kal-i), adv. 1. By root or origin; primitively; originally; naturally.

Tho' the Word [bless] be radically derived from the Dutch Word, yet it would bear good Sense, and be very pertinent to this Purpose, if we would fetch it from the French Word "blesser," which is to hurt. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 55.

These great Orbs thus radically bright.
Prior, Solomon, i.

2. In a radical manner; at the origin or root; fundamentally; essentially: as, a scheme or system radically wrong or defective.

The window tax, long condemned by universal consent as a radically bad tax. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, II. 313.

radicalness (rad′i-kal-nes), n. The state of being radical, in any sense.

radicand (rad-i-kand′), n. [< L. radicandus, ger. of radicari, take root: see radicate.] In math., an expression of which a root is to be extracted.

radicant (rad′i-kant), a. [< F. radicant, < L. radican(t-)s, ppr. of radicari, take root: see radicate.] In bot., rooting; specifically, producing roots from some part other than the descending axis, as for the purpose of climbing. Also radicating.

radicarian (rad-i-kā′ri-an), a. [< L. radix (radic-), root, + -arian.] Of or relating to roots.

The strength of the radicarian theory is that it accords with all that we have learned as to the nature of language. Whitney, Amer. Jour. Philol., Nov., 1880, p. 338.

Radicata (rad-i-kā′tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. radicatus, rooted: see radicate.] A division of polyzoans: same as Articulata (d): opposed to Incrustata.

radicate (rad′i-kāt), v.; pret. and pp. radicated, ppr. radicating. [< L. radicatus, pp. of radicari (> It. radicare = Sp. Pg. Pr. radicar), take or strike root, < radix (radic-), root: see radix.] I. intrans. To take root.

For evergreens, especially such as are tender, prune them not after planting till they do radicate. Evelyn, Sylva.

II. trans. To cause to take root; root; plant deeply and firmly.

Often remembrance to them [noblemen] of their astate may happen to radycate in theyr hartes intollerable pride. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 4.

This medical feature in the Essenes is not only found in the Christians, but is found radicated in the very constitution of that body. De Quincey, Essenes, iii.

radicate (rad′i-kāt), a. [< L. radicatus, pp. of radicari, take root: see radicate, v.] 1. In zoöl.: (a) Rooted; fixed at the bottom as if rooted; growing from a fixed root or root-like part. (b) Specifically, in conch.: (1) Byssiferous; fixed by a byssus. (2) Adherent by the base to some other body, as a limpet to a rock. (c) Rooted and of a plant-like habit, as a polyzoan; not incrusting like a lichen; belonging to the Radicata.—2. In bot., rooted.

radicated (rad′i-kā-ted), p. a. [< radicate, v., + *-ed*2.] Rooted, or having taken root: same as radicate: as, a radicated stem.

If, therefore, you would not cheat yourselves, as multitudes in this age have done, about your love to the brethren, try not by the bare act, but by the radicated, prevalent degree of your love. Baxter, Saints' Rest, iii. 11.

radicating (rad′i-kā-ting), p. a. In bot., same as radicant.

radication (rad-i-kā′shon), n. [< F. radication = Sp. radicación = Pg. radicação = It. radicazione, < ML. radicatio(n-), < L. radicari, pp. radicatus, take root: see radicate.] 1. The process of taking root, or the state of being rooted.

Pride is a sin of so deep radication, and so powerful in the hearts of carnal men, that it will take advantage of any condition. Baxter, Life of Faith, iii. 15.

2. In bot., the manner in which roots grow or are arranged.—3. In zoöl., fixation at the base, as if rooted; the state of being radicate or radicated.

radicet, n. An obsolete form of radish.

radicel (rad′i-sel), n. [< F. radicelle = It. radicella, < NL. radicella,* little root, dim. of L. radix (radic-), root.] 1. In bot., a minute root; a rootlet. Also radicle. A. Gray.—2. In zoöl., a rootlet or radicle.

radicicolous (rad-i-sik′ō-lus), a. [< L. radix (radic-), root, + colere, inhabit.] Living upon or infesting roots: specifically noting the root-form of the phylloxera or vine-pest: contrasted with gallicolous. See Phylloxera, 2.

radiciform (rā-dis′i-fôrm), a. [= F. It. radiciforme, < L. radix (radic-), root, + forma, form: see form.] 1. In bot., of the nature or appearance of a root. A. Gray.—2. In zoöl., root-like in aspect or function.

radicle (rad′i-kl), n. [= F. radicule = Sp. radícula, < L. radicula, rootlet, small root, also radish, soapwort, dim. of radix (radic-), root: see radix. Cf. radicel.] 1. In bot.: (a) A rootlet: same as radicel. (b) Specifically, same as caulicle: by late writers appropriately restricted to the rudimentary root at the lower extremity of the caulicle.—2. In anat. and zoöl., a little root or root-like part; a radix: as, the radicles of a vein (the minute vessels which unite to form a vein); the radicle of a nerve.—3. In philol., same as radical, 1. [Unusual.]

Radicles are elementary relational parts of words. They are generally single sounds—oftenest a consonant sound. F. A. March, Anglo-Saxon Grammar (1869), p. 33.

4. In chem., same as radical, 2.

A radicle may consist of a single elementary atom, and it then forms a simple radicle; or it may consist of a group of atoms, in which case it constitutes a compound radicle. W. A. Miller, Elem. of Chemistry, § 1061.

Adverse, centrifugal, centripetal radicle. See the adjectives.

radicolous (rā-dik′ō-lus), a. A contracted form of radicicolous.

radicose (rad′i-kōs), a. [= Sp. Pg. radicoso, < L. radicosus, full of roots, < radix (radic-), a root: see radix.] In bot., having a large root.

radicula (rā-dik′ū-lä), n.; pl. radiculæ (-lē). [L.: see radicle.] In entom., a radicle.

radicular (rā-dik′ū-lär), a. [< radicule + *-ar*3.] Characterized by the presence of a radicle or radicles.—Radicular odontome, an odontome formed on the neck or root of a tooth.

radicule (rad′i-kūl), n. [< F. radicule, < L. radicula, little root: see radicle.] In bot., same as radicle, 1.

radiculose (rā-dik′ū-lōs), a. [< NL. radiculosus,* < L. radicula, rootlet: see radicle.] In bot., covered with radicles or rootlets.

radii, n. Plural of radius.

radiism (rā′di-izm), n. [< L. radius, ray, + -ism.] In zoöl., same as radiation, 3. Forbes, Brit. Sea Urchins.

radiocarpal (rā″di-ō-kär′pal), a. [< L. radius, radius, + NL. carpus, the wrist: see carpal.] 1. Pertaining to the radius and the carpus or wrist: as, the radiocarpal articulation; radiocarpal ligaments.—2. Situated on the radial side of the wrist: as, the radiocarpal bone. See radiale.—Radiocarpal arteries, the anterior and posterior carpal arteries; small branches given off from the radial at the wrist and passing to the front and back to help form the anterior and posterior carpal arches.—Radiocarpal articulation, the wrist-joint proper; the jointing of the manus or third segment of the forelimb of any vertebrate with the second or preceding segment. In animals whose ulna is shorter than the radius this joint is formed wholly by the radius in articulation with some or all of the proximal row of carpal bones, constituting a radiocarpal articulation in literal strictness; but the ulna often enters into this joint without altering its name. In man, whose pronation and supination are perfect, the ulna reaches the wrist, but is cut off from direct articulation with any carpal by a button of cartilage interposed between itself and the cuneiform, and the radius articulates with both the scaphoid and the semilunar, so that the human wrist-joint is properly radiocarpal.—Radiocarpal ligament, the external lateral ligament of the radiocarpal articulation. It extends from the summit of the styloid process of the radius to the outer side of the scaphoid.

Radioflagellata (rā″di-ō-flaj-e-lā′tä), n. pl. [NL.: see radioflagellate.] An order of animalcules emitting numerous ray-like pseudopodia, after the manner of the Radiolaria, and provided at the same time with one or more flagellate appendages, but having no distinct oral aperture. They are mostly marine. In Kent's system they consist of two families, Actinomonadidæ and Euchitonidæ.

radioflagellate (rā″di-ō-flaj′e-lāt), a. [< L. radius, ray, + flagellum, a whip: see *flagellate*1.] Having radiating pseudopodia and flagella; of or pertaining to the Radioflagellata.

radiography (rā-di-og′ra-fi), n. The production of images on sensitized plates by means of the X-rays or rays from radioactive substances.

radiohumeral (rā″di-ō-hū′me-ral), a. [< L. radius, ray, + humerus, prop. umerus, a shoulder: see humeral.] Relating to the radius and the humerus: as, the radiohumeral articulation or ligament.

Radiola (rā-dī′ō-lä), n. [NL., so named in reference to the many branches; < L. radiolus, a little ray, also a plant resembling a fern, dim. of radius, a ray: see *radius, ray*1.] A name given by Roth in 1788 to Millegrana, a genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the Linaceæ, or flax family, distinguished from the nearly related genus Linum (flax) by its complete numerical symmetry in fours (instead of fives), having four toothed sepals, four twisted petals, four distinct stamens, a four-celled ovary, four styles, and an eight-celled, eight-seeded capsule. The only species, Millegrana Radiola, is a little annual with forking stem, opposite leaves, and minute white corymbose flowers.

Radiolaria (rā″di-ō-lā′ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of radiolaris,* < L. radiolus, a little ray: see Radiola.] A class of filose non-corticate Protozoa: a name applied by Haeckel (in 1862) to the protozoans called by Ehrenberg Polycystina. The radiolarians are marine gymnomyxine protozoans in which no contractile vacuoles are observed, having an amœbiform body of spherical or conical figure with radiant filose pseudopods, inclosing a similarly shaped perforated test of membranous texture called the central capsule. The intracapsular protoplasm is continuous through the perforations with that which is extracapsular, and has a large specialized nucleus or several such nuclei. There is usually a skeleton of silicious spicules or of the substance called acanthin, and embedded in the protoplasm may be oil-globules, pigment-granules, and crystals. Most radiolarians contain peculiar nucleated yellow corpuscles regarded as symbiotic algals. Reproduction both by fission and by sporulation has been observed. The Radiolaria have been divided into the subclasses Siliceskeleta and Acanthometridea, according to the chemical composition of the skeleton, the former subclass into Peripylæa, Monopylæa, and Tripylæa (or Phæodaria); into Monocyttaria, with one central capsule, and Polycyttaria, with several such; and in various other ways. The latest monographer arranges them under four subclasses or "legions": (1) Peripylea or Spumellaria, with 32 families; (2) Actipylea or Acantharia, with 12 families; (3) Monopylea or Nassellaria, with 26 families; and (4) Cannopylea or Phæodaria, with 15 families. The term Radiolaria appears to have been first used by Johannes Müller, in 1858, for the organisms known as Polycystina, Thalassicolla, and Acanthometra. The marine radiolarians all inhabit the superficial stratum of the sea, and fabricate their skeletons of the infinitesimally small proportion of silex which is dissolved in sea-water. When they die these skeletons sink to the bottom, and thus rock masses have been formed, such as those found at Oran in Algeria, and at Bissex Hill in Barbados, which are very largely made up of exquisitely preserved skeletons of Radiolaria. Radiolaria are found fossil in all formations from the Cambrian upward, though few are found in the Chalk, their silicious skeletons having probably been dissolved and redeposited as flint. Recent remains of radiolarians enter largely into the composition of the so-called radiolarian ooze.

A Radiolarian (Heliosphæra pectinata), 160 times natural size.

radiolarian (rā″di-ō-lā′ri-an), a. and n. [< Radiolaria + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Radiolaria; containing or consisting of radiolarians.—Radiolarian ooze, the ooze or sediment at the bottom of the sea, composed in part of the shells of radiolarians. See globigerina-mud.

Their siliceous skeletons accumulate in some localities . . . to such an extent as to form a Radiolarian ooze. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 507.

II. n. Any member of the Radiolaria.

radiolite (rā′di-ō-līt), n. [< NL. radiolites, < radiolus, dim. of L. radius, ray: see radius.] 1. A member of the genus Radiolites.—2. A variety of natrolite, occurring in radiated forms in the zircon-syenite of southern Norway.

Radiolites (rā″di-ō-lī′tēz), n. [NL.: see radiolite.] A genus of Rudistæ, typical of the family Radiolitidæ. The typical species have at maturity valves elevated in a coniform manner in opposite directions, and sculptured with radiating grooves and ridges.

Radiolitidæ (rā″di-ō-lit′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Radiolites + -idæ.] A family of Rudistæ, typified by the genus Radiolites. The shell is very inequivalve and fixed by one valve; the hinge has one cardinal tooth and two sockets in the fixed valve, and two cardinal teeth in the free; the external layer of the shell is thick and the internal thin; the summit of the free valve is nearly central in the adult, but submarginal in the young. The family is characteristic of the Cretaceous period.

radiolus (rā-dī′ō-lus), n.; pl. radioli (-lī). [NL., dim. of L. radius, a ray: see radius.] In ornith., one of the barbules, or rays of the second order, of the main shaft of a feather.—Radioli accessorii, the barbules of the aftershaft or hypoptilum of a feather.

★radiometer (rā-di-om′e-tėr), n. [= F. radiomètre = Sp. radiómetro, < L. radius, a ray, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] 1. An old instrument for measuring angles; the cross-staff. The end of the staff was held to the eye, and the crosspiece was shifted until it just covered the angle to be measured, when the latter was read off on the longitudinal staff.

Radiometer or Cross-staff.

2. An instrument which transforms radiant energy into mechanical work. It consists of four crossed arms of very fine glass, supported in the center by a needle-point, and having at the ends thin disks or squares of mica, or aluminium foil, usually blackened on one side. When placed in a glass vessel nearly exhausted of air, and exposed to rays of light or heat, the blackened surfaces absorb the radiant energy and become heated, the molecules of the air remaining in the vessel striking against them gain from them greater velocity, and there results an increased pressure, causing a more or less rapid revolution of the arms. By varying the conditions as to degree of exhaustion, size of bulb, etc., a number of experiments are performed with the radiometer which serve to illustrate the mechanical effects of the rapidly moving molecules of a gas.

Crookes's Radiometer.

radiometric (rā″di-ō-met′rik), a. Pertaining to the radiometer, or to the experiments performed by it.

radiomicrometer (rā″di-ō-mī-krom′e-tėr), n. [< L. radius, ray, + E. micrometer.] An instrument serving as a very delicate means of measuring small amounts of heat. It consists essentially of an antimony-bismuth thermo-electric couple of very small dimensions, with the ends joined by a hoop of copper wire, and suspended by a slender thread of quartz in a powerful magnetic field. It is claimed for it that it can be made more sensitive than the bolometer.

radiomuscular (rā″di-ō-mus′kū-lär), a. [< L. radius, radius, + musculus, muscle: see muscle[1], muscular.] In anat., pertaining to the radius and to muscles: specifically noting muscular branches of the radial artery and of the radial nerve. Coues.

radiophone (rā′di-ō-fōn), n. [< L. radius, ray, + Gr. φωνή, voice, sound: see phone[1].] An instrument in which a sound is produced by the successive expansions and contractions of a body under the action of an intermittent beam of radiant heat thrown upon and absorbed by it.

radiophonics (rā″di-ō-fon′iks), n. [Pl. of radiophonic (see -ics).] Same as radiophony.

radiophony (rā′di-ō-fō-ni), n. [< L. radius, ray, + Gr. φωνή, voice, sound: see phone[1].] The production of sound by the action of an intermittent beam of radiant heat; that branch of acoustics which considers sound so produced. For example, if the beam from a lime-light is thrown upon a rotating disk perforated with a series of holes, and, after thus being rendered intermittent, is made to fall upon a confined mass of a liquid or gas capable of absorbing radiant heat, a musical note is obtained from the latter whose pitch depends upon the rapidity of the rotation. Similar results are obtained with a plate of an appropriate solid, as hard rubber. Radiophony also includes the more complex case where an intermittent beam of light, falling upon a substance like selenium (also in a less degree sulphur), serves to vary its electrical resistance, and hence the strength of current passing through it, so as to produce a corresponding sound in a telephone-receiver placed in the circuit. This is illustrated in the photophone.

radio-ulnar (rā″di-ō-ul′när), a. [< L. radius, radius, + ulna, ulna: see ulna, ulnar.] Of or belonging to the radius and the ulna: as, the radio-ulnar articulation.—Radio-ulnar fibrocartilage. See fibrocartilage.

radious (rā′di-us), a. [< ME. radious, radyous, radius, < OF. radios*, F. radieux = Sp. Pg. It. radioso, < L. radiosus, radiant, beaming, < radius, a ray: see radius.] 1†. Consisting of rays, as light. Berkeley.—2†. Radiating; radiant.

> His radious head with shameful thorns they tear.
> G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph over Death, st. 35.

3. In bot., same as radiant. [Rare.]

radish (rad′ish), n. [Formerly also raddish (also dial. redish, reddish, appar. simulating reddish, of a red color); early mod. E. radice, radyce; < ME. radish = D. radijs = LG. radys = G. radies = Dan. radis = Sw. rädisa, radis, radisa, < OF. radis, F. radis, a radish, < Pr. raditz, a root, a radish, = OF. raïs, raïz (also radice), a root, = It. radice, a root, radish, = AS. rædic, rædic, erroneously hrædic, ME. radik = MLG. redik, redek, redich = OHG. rātih, rātich, MHG. rætich, rätich, retich, G. rettich, rettig = Dan. räddike = Sw. rättika, a radish, < L. radix (radic-), a root, in particular an edible root, esp. a radish: see radix.] 1. A plant, Raphanus sativus, cultivated for its edible root; also other species of the same genus. (See phrases below.) The radish of cultivation is unknown in a wild state, but is thought by many to be derived from the wild radish, R. Raphanistrum. It has been highly prized from the days of ancient Egypt for its crisp fleshy root, which is little nutritious, but pleasantly pungent and antiscorbutic, and is mostly eaten raw as a relish or in salads. The radish commonly must be young and fresh, but some varieties are grown for winter use. The root varies greatly in size (but is ordinarily eaten when small), in form (being long and tapering, turnip shaped, olive-shaped, etc.), and also in color (being white, scarlet, pink, reddish-purple, yellowish, or brown). The leaves were formerly boiled and eaten, and the green pods make a pickle somewhat resembling capers.

2. A root of this plant.—3. Same as water-radish.—Horse radish. See horse-radish.—Rat-tail radish, a species (Raphanus caudatus) or perhaps a variety of the common radish, a curiosity from the East Indies, with narrow pods a foot or more long, which are boiled or pickled for the table.—Sea-radish, or seaside radish, a variety of the wild radish, sometimes regarded as a species (Raphanus maritimus) found on European coasts.—Wild radish, a noxious field-weed, Raphanus Raphanistrum, resembling charlock, but having necklace-formed pods, and hence sometimes called jointed charlock. It has rough lyrate leaves, and yellowish petals turning whitish or purplish. It is adventive in the eastern United States.

radish-fly (rad′ish-flī), n. An American dipterous insect, Anthomyia raphani, injurious to the radish.

★radium (rā′di-um), n. [NL., < L. radius. See radius.] A remarkable radio-active substance discovered in pitch-blende by M. and Mme. Curie in 1898. See the supplement.

★radius (rā′di-us), n.; pl. radii (-ī). [< L. radius, a staff, rod, spoke of a wheel, a measuring-rod, a semidiameter of a circle (as it were a spoke of the wheel), a shuttle, spur of a bird, sting of a fish, the radius of the arm; by transfer, a beam of light, a ray. Cf. ray[1] (a doublet of radius) and the derived radiant, radiate, irradiate, etc.] 1. In math., one of a number of lines proceeding from a center; especially, a line which is drawn from the center to a circle or sphere; also, the measure of the semidiameter.—2. In anat. and zoöl., the outer one of the two bones of the forearm, or corresponding part of the fore leg; the bone on the thumb side of the forearm, extending from the humerus to the carpus, and bearing upon its distal end the manus or hand: so called from its revolving, somewhat like a spoke, about the ulna, as in man and other mammals whose fore limb exhibits the motions called pronation and supination. In most animals, however, the radius is motionless, being fixed in a state of pronation, when it appears as the inner rather than the outer of the two bones, or as by far the larger bone, of the forearm, the ulna being often much reduced. In man the radius is as long as the ulna without the olecranon, and somewhat stouter, especially in its distal parts. It presents a small, circular, cupped and button-like head, for articulation with the capitulum of the humerus and lesser sigmoid cavity of the ulna, following which is a constriction termed the neck, and next to this a tubercle for the insertion of the biceps muscle. The shaft enlarges from above downward, and is of somewhat prismatic form, with the sharpest edge of the prism presenting toward the ulna. The lower end has two large articular facets for articulation with the scaphoid and lunar bones (forming the radiocarpal articulation, or wrist-joint), a lateral facet for the radio-ulnar articulation, and a stout projection called the styloid process, for the insertion of the supinator longus muscle. The radius is pronated by the pronator radii teres and pronator quadratus, and supinated by the supinator longus and supinator brevis, assisted by the biceps. Quite a similar form and disposition of the radius characterize various mammals which use their fore paws like hands, as monkeys, mice, squirrels, opossums, etc. The radius of others, as the horse and ox, is more different, and associated with a much reduced and ankylosed ulna. In birds the radius is so peculiarly articulated with the humerus that it slides lengthwise back and forth upon the ulna in the opening and closing of the wing, pronation and supination being absent in this class of animals. See pronation and supination, and cuts under carpus, Catarrhina, Equidæ, forearm, ox, pinion, Plesiosaurus, and solidungulate.

3. In ichth., a bone of the pectoral arch, wrongly identified by some naturalists with the radius of higher vertebrates. The one so called by Cuvier is the hypercoracoid, and that of Owen is the hypocoracoid.—4. In entom., a vein of the wing of some insects, extending from the pterostigma to the tip of the wing.—5. [cap.] In conch., a genus of Ovulidæ. R. volva is the shuttle-shell or weaver-shell.—6. pl. In ornith., the barbs of the main shaft of a feather; the rays of the first order of the rachis.—7. In arachnology, one of the radiating lines of a geometrical spider's web, which are connected by a single spiral line.—8. In echinoderms, one of the five radial pieces of the dentary apparatus of a sea-urchin, being an arched rod-like piece articulated at its base with the inner extremity of each rotula, running more or less nearly parallel with the rotula, and ending in a free bifurcated extremity. Also called the compass of the lantern of Aristotle (which see, under lantern). See also cut B under lantern.—9. pl. Specifically, in Cirripedia, the lateral parts of the shell, as distinguished from the paries, when they overlap: when overlapped by others, they are called alæ.—10. In bot., a ray, as of a composite flower, etc.—11. The movable limb or arm of a sextant; also, a similar feature in any other instrument for measuring angles.—12. In fort., a line drawn from the center of the polygon to the end of the outer side.—Auricular radii. See auricular.—Geometrical radius of a cog-wheel, the radius of the pitch-circle of the wheel, in contradistinction to its real radius, which is that of the circle formed by the crests of the teeth.—Oblique line of the radius. See oblique.—Pronator radii quadratus. See pronator quadratus, under pronator.—Pronator radii teres. See pronator.—Proportional radii, in a system of gears, or in a set of gears of the same pitch, radii proportioned in length to the number of teeth in the respective wheels. The proportional radii of any two geared wheels, when taken together, are equal to the line connecting the centers of the wheels, which line is the basis of computation in determining them. Also called primitive radii.—Radii accessorii, the barbs of the aftershaft or hyporachis of a feather.—Radius astronomicus. Same as radiometer, 1.—Radius of concavity. Same as radius of curvature.—Radius of curvature, the radius of the circle of curvature—that is, of the osculating circle at any point of a curve. In the cut, AHBC is the primitive curve (in this case an ellipse); KHJ, the circle of curvature, osculating the primitive curve at H; T, the center of curvature; TH, the radius of curvature; GFTED, the locus of centers of curvature, or the evolute. The radius of curvature wrapping itself upon the evolute gives the primitive curve.—Radius of dissipation. See dissipation.—Radius of explosion. See mine[2], 2 (b).—Radius of gyration, in mech., the distance from the axis to a point such that, if the whole mass of a body were concentrated into it, the moment of inertia would remain unchanged. If the axis is a principal axis, this radius becomes a principal radius of gyration.—Radius of rupture. See mine[2], 2 (b).—Radius of the evolute. Same as radius of curvature.—Radius of torsion, the element of the arc of a curve divided by the angle of torsion.—Radius vector (pl. radii vectores), the length of the line joining a variable point to a fixed origin: in astronomy the origin is taken at the sun or other central body. See vector.—Real radius. See geometrical radius.

Radius of Curvature.

★radius-bar (rā′di-us-bär), n. In a steam-engine, one of a pair of rods pivoted at one end and connected at the other with some concentrically moving part which it is necessary to keep at a definite distance from the pivot or center. Also called radius-rod and bridle-rod. See cuts under grasshopper-beam and paddle-wheel.

radius-saw (rā′di-us-sâ), n. A circular saw journaled at the end of a swinging frame or radial shaft, used in cross-cutting timber.

★radix (rā′diks), n.; pl. radices (rā-dī′sēz). [< L. radix (radic-), a root, = Gr. ῥάδιξ, a branch, rod. Hence ult. E. race[4] and radish (doublets of radix), radical, radicel, radicle, radicule, radicate, eradicate, aracc[1], etc.] 1. The root of a plant: used chiefly with reference to the roots of medicinal plants or preparations from them. Hence—2. The primary source or origin; that from which anything springs, or in which it originates. [Rare.]

> Her wit is all spirit, that spirit fire, that fire flies from her tongue, able to burne the radix of the best invention; in this element she is the abstract and briefe of all the eloquence since the incarnation of Tully.
> Heywood, Fair Maid of the Exchange (Works, 1874, II. 54).

> Judaism is the radix of Christianity—Christianity the integration of Judaism. De Quincey, Essenes, iii.

3. In etym., a primitive word or form from which spring other words; a radical; a root.—4. In math., a root. (a) Any number which is arbitrarily made the fundamental number or base of any system of numbers, to be raised to different powers. Thus, 10 is the radix of the decimal system of numeration. In the common system of logarithms (Briggs's) the radix is also 10; in the Napierian it is 2.7182818284; every other number is considered as some power of the radix, the exponent of which power constitutes the logarithm of that number. (b) The root of a finite expression from which a series is derived.

5. In zoöl. and anat., a root; a rooted or root-like part; a radicle: as, the radix or root of a tooth; the radix of a nerve.—Radix cerebelli, the posterior peduncle of the cerebellum.—Radix motoria, the smaller motor root of the trigeminal nerve.—Radix sensoria, the larger sensory root of the trigeminal nerve.

radly†, adv. See rathly.

radness† (rad′nes), n. [ME., < rad[1] + -ness.] Fear; fright; terror.

The Romaynes for radnesse ruschte to the erthe, Fforde ferdnesse of hys face, as they fey were.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 120.

radoub (ra-döb′), n. [F., repairs made on a vessel, < radouber, formerly also redouber, mend, repair: see redub.] In mercantile law, the repairing and refitting of a ship for a voyage. Wharton.

radula (rad′ū-lä), n.; pl. radulæ (-lē). [NL., < L. radula, a scraper, scraping-iron, < radere, scrape: see rase[1], raze[1].] In conch., the tongue or lingual ribbon of a mollusk, specifically called odontophore, and more particularly, the rasping surface or set of teeth of the odontophore, which bites like a file. This structure is highly characteristic of the cephalophorous classes, among which it presents great diversity in detail. It bears the numerous small chitinous processes or teeth of these mollusks, which serve to triturate food with a kind of filing or rasping action. According to the disposition of the teeth in any one of the many cross-rows which beset the length of the radula, mollusks are called rachiglossate, tænioglossate, rhipidoglossate, toxoglossate, ptenoglossate, and docoglossate. See these words, and odontophore.

radular (rad′ū-lär), a. [< radula + -ar[3].] Pertaining to the radula: as, radular teeth.

radulate (rad′ū-lāt), a. [< radula + -ate[1].] Provided with a radula, as a cephalophorous mollusk; raduliferous.

raduliferous (rad-ū-lif′e-rus), a. [< NL. radula + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] Bearing a radula; radulate.

raduliform (rad′ū-li-fôrm), a. [< L. radula, a scraper, + forma, form.] Rasp-like; having the character or appearance of the teeth of a file; cardiform: specifically noting, in ichthyology, the conical, sharp-pointed, and close-set teeth of some fishes, resembling villiform teeth, but larger and stronger.

rae (rā), n. A Scotch form of roe.

rafe†. A Middle English preterit of reave.

raff† (råf), v. t. [< OF. raffer, rafer, catch, snatch, slip away, = It. raffare*, in comp. arraffare, snatch, seize, = MHG. raffen, reffen, G. raffen, snatch, sweep away, carry off suddenly, = MLG. LG. rapen, snatch, = Sw. rappa, snatch, seize, = Dan. rappe, hasten: see rap[2], from the Scand. form cognate with the G. Hence ult. raffle[1].] To sweep; snatch, draw, or huddle together; take by a promiscuous sweep.

Their causes and effects . . . I thus raffe vp together.
R. Carew, Survey of Cornwall, fol. 69.

raff (råf), n. and a. [< ME. raffe, raf, esp. in the phrase rif and raf (now riffraff), < OF. rif et raf, every bit, in which raf is due to the verb raffer, snatch: see raff, v. Cf. riffraff. Cf. It. raffola, a crowd, press.] I. n. 1. A promiscuous heap or collection; a jumble; a medley. [Obsolete or archaic.]

The synod of Trent was convened to settle a raff of errors and superstitions. Barrow, Unity of the Church.

2. Trashy material; lumber; rubbish; refuse. [Old and prov. Eng.]

And maken of the rym and raf
Suche gylours for pompe and pride.
Appendix to W. Mapes, p. 340. (Halliwell.)

Let raffs be rife in prose and rhyme,
We lack not rhymes and reasons,
As on this whirligig of Time
We circle with the seasons.
Tennyson, Will Waterproof.

3. Abundance; affluence. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]—4. A worthless or disorderly person; a rowdy; a scapegrace: now applied to students of Oxford by the townspeople. Halliwell.

Myself and this great peer
Of these rude raffs became the jeer.
W. Combe, Dr. Syntax, i. 20. (Davies.)

One of the raffs we shrink from in the street,
Wore an old hat, and went with naked feet.
Leigh Hunt, High and Low. (Davies.)

5. Collectively, worthless persons; the scum or sweepings of society; the rabble. Compare riffraff.

"People, you see," he said, "won't buy their 'accounts' of raff; they won't have them of any but respectable."
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 325.

II. a. Idle; dissolute. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Raffaelesque, a. See Raphaelesque.

raffe, raffle (raf, raf′i), n. [Origin obscure.] Naut., a three-cornered sail set on schooners when before the wind or nearly so. The head hoists up to the foretopmast-head and the clues haul out to the square-sail yard-arms. It is rarely used except on the Great Lakes of North America. Sometimes it is in two pieces, one for each side of the mast.

Raffe.

raffia, roffia (raf′i-ä, rof′-i-ä), n. [Malagasy.] 1. A palm, Raphia Ruffia, growing in Madagascar. It bears pinnate leaves 20 or 30 feet long upon a moderate trunk. The cuticle is peeled from both sides of the leaf-stalk, for use as a fiber, being largely made into matting, and also applied by the natives to finer textile purposes. (See rabanna.) It is now somewhat largely used for agricultural tie-bands, as is also a similar product of the jupati-palm, R. tædigera, included under the same name. Also spelled raphia.

2. The fiber of this plant.

raffish (råf′ish), a. [< raff + -ish[1].] Resembling or having the character of the raff or rabble; scampish; worthless; rowdy. Compare raff, n., 5.

Five or six raffish-looking men had surrounded a fair, delicate girl, and were preparing to besiege her in form.
Lawrence, Guy Livingstone, xxiii.

The raffish young gentleman in gloves must measure his scholarship with the plain, clownish laddie from the parish school. R. L. Stevenson, The Foreigner at Home.

raffle[1] (raf′l), n. [< ME. rafle, a game at dice (= Sw. raffel, a raffle); < OF. rafle, raffle, F. rafle, a pair royal at dice (faire rafle, sweep the stakes), also a grape-stalk, < rafler, snatch, seize, carry off, < G. raffeln, snatch up, freq. of raffen, snatch, snatch away, carry off hastily: see raff, v. Cf. raffle[2].] 1†. A game with dice.

Now comth hasardrie with hise apurtenaunces, as tables and rafles, of which comth deceite, false othes, chidynges, and alle ravynes, blasphemynge and reneyinge of God.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

2. A method of sale by chance or lottery, in which the price of the thing to be disposed of is divided into equal shares, and the persons taking the shares cast lots for its possession by throwing dice or otherwise.

raffle[1] (raf′l), v.; pret. and pp. raffled, ppr. raffling. [= Sw. raffla = Dan. rafle, raffle; from the noun.] I. intrans. To try the chance of a raffle; engage in a raffle: as, to raffle for a watch.

They were raffling for his coat.
S. Butler, Satire upon Gaming.

The great Rendezvous is at night, after the Play and Opera are done; and Raffling for all Things Vendible is the great Diversion. Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 176.

II. trans. To dispose of by means of a raffle: often with off: as, to raffle or raffle off a watch.

raffle[2] (raf′l), v.; pret. and pp. raffled, ppr. raffling. raffle[2] (raf′l), n. [< raffle[2], v. Cf. raff, n.] Naut., raff; lumber; rubbish.

Her decks were heavily encumbered with what sailors call raffle—that is, the muddle of ropes, torn canvas, staves of boats and casks, . . . with which the ocean illustrates her violence. W. C. Russell, Death Ship, xxx.

raffle[3] (raf′l), n. [Origin obscure.] Same as raffle-net.

raffled (raf′ld), a. [Origin obscure.] Having the edge finely divided or serrated.

A peculiar small cut or raffled leaf resembling an ivy, or more nearly a vine leaf.
Soulages Catalogue, p. 116, note to No. 365.

raffle-net (raf′l-net), n. A kind of fishing-net.

raffler (raf′lėr), n. [< raffle[2] + -er[1].] One who raffles.

Rafflesia (raf-lē′zi-ä), n. [NL. (R. Brown, 1821), named after Sir Stamford Raffles, British governor in Sumatra, and companion to the botanist Dr. Joseph Arnold, who discovered there the first known species, R. Arnoldi, in 1818.] A genus of parasitic plants, type of the family Rafflesiaceæ and of the tribe Rafflesieæ, characterized by a perianth of five large entire and fleshy imbricated lobes, numerous stigmas, and globose many-chambered anthers, each opening by a single pore, which form a ring at the revolute top of a column rising in the center of the flower. The flowers are dioecious, and the pistillate ones contain an ovary with a labyrinth of small cells and numerous ovules. The 5 or 6 species are natives of hot and damp jungles in the Malay archipelago. The whole plant consists of a single flower, without leaves or proper stem, growing out from the porous root or stem of species of Cissus, at a time when the leaves and flowers of the foster-plant have withered. The flower of the parasite protrudes as a knob from the bark at first, and enlarges for some months, resembling before opening a close cabbage, and remaining fully expanded only a few days. It exhales an odor of tainted meat, securing cross-fertilization by aid of the flies thus attracted to it. The flower reaches 3 inches or more in diameter in R. Rochussenii (valued by the Javanese for astringent and styptic properties), 6 inches in others, and 2 feet in R. Patma. R. Arnoldi has long been famed for its size, greatly exceeding the Victoria lily (23 inches), and even exceeding Aristolochia Goldieana (a specimen of which at Kew, March, 1890, was 28 inches long and 16 broad). The first flower of R. Arnoldi found measured 3 feet across its flat circular top, and weighed about 15 pounds; the roundish calyx-lobes were each a foot long, and in places an inch thick; and the globular central cup was a foot across and held about 6 quarts. The fruit ripens into a chestnut-brown and truncated nut, about 5 inches thick, with irregularly furrowed and broken surface, and containing thousands of hard, curiously appendaged and lacunose seeds. The flower is flesh-colored and mottled pink and yellow within, and with brown or bluish scales beneath. It is called ambun-ambun or wonder-wonder by the Malays, and krubut, a name which they also give to another gigantic plant which grows with it, the ovoid Candarum Titanum.

Rafflesiaceæ (raf-lē-zi-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Dumortier, 1829), < Rafflesia + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous parasitic plants of which Rafflesia is the type. It is characterized by the presence of scattered or imbricated scales in place of leaves, and flowers with from four to ten usually imbricated calyx-lobes, the anthers forming one, two, or three circles about a column in the center of the staminate flower, and the one or many stigmas terminating a similar column in the pistillate flower. It includes about 24 species in 7 genera, scattered through warm climates, and extending into the Mediterranean region, South Africa, and Mexico. All are indwelling parasites, issuing out of the roots or branches of various trees and shrubs. They vary in habit, having in Hypocistis a colored fleshy and distinct stem and many-flowered spike, while in the other genera the whole plant consists of a single flower sessile on its embedded rhizome. They range from a minute size in Apodanthes and large in other genera to the monster flower of Rafflesia, the type. The plants are called patma-worts by some botanists.

Rafflesieæ (raf-lē-zī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Robert Brown, 1842), < Rafflesia + -eæ.] A tribe of parasitic plants of the family Rafflesiaceæ, containing besides Rafflesia two other genera.

Avowynge of King Arthur, xxv.

2. A sort of float or framework formed of logs, planks, or other pieces of timber fastened or lashed together side by side, for the convenience of transporting the constituent materials down rivers, across harbors, etc. Rafts of logs to be floated to a distant point are often very large, strongly constructed, and carry huts for the numerous men required to manage them. Those of the Rhine are sometimes 400 or 500 feet long, with 200 or more hands. A cigar-shaped raft of large logs, 560 feet long, 50 feet wide, and 35 feet deep, was lost in December, 1887, under towage by sea from Nova Scotia to New York; but other large rafts have been successfully transported.

3. A structure similarly formed of any materials for the floating or transportation of persons or things. In cases of shipwreck, planks, spars, barrels, etc., are often hastily lashed together to form a raft for escape. In passenger-vessels life-rafts frequently form part of the permanent equipment. See life-raft.

Where is that son
That floated with thee on the fatal raft?
Shak., C. of E., v. 1. 348.

4. An accumulation of driftwood from fallen trees in a river, lodged and compacted so as to form a permanent obstruction. Rafts of this kind exist or have existed in the Mississippi and other rivers of the western United States, the largest ever formed being that of the Red River, which during many years completely blocked the channel for 45 miles.

5. A conglomeration of eggs of some animals, as certain insects and mollusks, fastened together and forming a mass; a float. See cut under Ianthina.

A great many eggs [of the common cockroach] are laid at one time, the whole number being surrounded by a stiff chitinous coat, forming the so-called raft.
Amer. Nat., XXII. 857.

raft[1] (råft), v. t. [< raft[1], n.] I. trans. 1. To transport or float on a raft.

Guns taken out of a ship to lighten her when aground should be hoisted out and rafted clear, if there is any danger of bilging on them. Luce, Seamanship, p. 182, note.

The idea of rafting timber by the ocean.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII. 17.

2. To make a raft of; form into a raft.

As soon as the blubber is taken off, it is rafted—tied together with ropes in a sort of raft—and lies in the water until taken on board ship.
C. M. Scammon, Marine Mammals, p. 63.

I could see him securing these planks to one another by lashings. By the time he had rafted them, nearly an hour had passed since he had left the sandbank.
W. C. Russell, A Strange Voyage, xlvi.

II. intrans. To manage a raft; work upon a raft or rafts; travel by raft.

They canoed, and rafted, and steam-boated, and travelled with packhorses. Academy, Nov. 10, 1888, p. 301.

raft[2] (råft), n. [A var. of raff, appar. by confusion with raft[1].] A miscellaneous collection or heap; a promiscuous lot: used slightingly: as, a raft of papers; a whole raft of things to be attended to. [Colloq., U. S.]

This last spring a raft of them [Irish maids] was out of employment. Philadelphia Times, Oct. 24, 1886.

raft-breasted (råft'bres″ted), a. In ornith., ratite. W. K. Parker.

raft-dog (råft'dog), n. An iron bar with ends bent over and pointed, for securing logs together in a raft. The points are driven respectively into adjacent or juxtaposed logs, which are thus bonded to each other.

raft-duck (råft'duk), n. The scaup or blackhead duck, Aythya or Fuligula or Fulix marila: so called in the United States from its flocking closely on the water, as if forming a raft of ducks. Also called bluebill, shuffler, and flocking-fowl. See cut under scaup.—Red-headed raft-duck. Same as redhead, 2.

rafte†. An obsolete preterit and past participle of reave. Chaucer.

rafter[1] (råf'tèr), n. [< ME. rafter, refter, < AS. ræfter, pl. ræftras, reftres (= MD. rafter = MLG. rafter, raffert), a beam, rafter; with formative -er, from ræft* = Icel. raptr (raftr) = Sw. Dan. raft, a rafter, beam: see raft.] 1. In building, one of the beams which give the slope of a roof, and to which is secured the lath or other framework upon which the slate or other outer covering is nailed. The rafters extend from the eaves to the ridge of the roof, abutting at their upper ends on corresponding rafters rising from the opposite side of the roof, or resting against a crown-plate or ridge-plate as the case may be. For the different kinds of rafters in a structure, see roof, and cuts under curb-roof, jack-rafter, and pontoon.

Shepherd, I take thy word,
And trust thy honest offer'd courtesy,
Which oft is sooner found in lowly sheds
With smoky rafters than in tap'stry halls.
Milton, Comus, l. 324.

2. Same as carline[4], 2.—3. In anat., a trabecule or trabeculum: as, the rafters of the embryonic skull.—Binding-rafter. See binding.—Intermediate rafter, a rafter placed between the ordinary rafters, or between principal rafters, to strengthen a roof.—Principal rafter, a main timber in an assemblage of carpentry; especially, one of those rafters which are larger than the common rafters, and are framed at their lower ends into the tie-beam, and either abut at their upper ends against the king-post or receive the ends of the straining-beams when queen-posts are used. The principal rafters support the purlins, which again carry the common rafters: thus the whole weight of the roof is sustained by the principal rafters.

rafter[1] (råf'tèr), v. t. [< rafter[1], n.] 1. To form into or like rafters: as, to rafter timber. —2. To furnish or build with rafters: as, to rafter a house.

> Battle of Harlaw (Child's Ballads, VII. 184).
> So the ruffians growl'd,
> Fearing to lose, and all for a dead man,
> Their chance of booty from the morning's raid.
> Tennyson, Geraint.

Hence—2. A sudden onset in general; an irruption for or as if for assault or seizure; a descent made in an unexpected or undesired manner: as, a police raid upon a gambling-house. [Chiefly colloq.]

raid (rād), v. [< raid, n.] I. intrans. To go upon a raid; engage in a sudden hostile or disturbing incursion, foray, or descent.

> The Saxons were perpetually raiding along the confines of Gaul. The Atlantic, LXV. 153.

II. trans. 1. To make a raid or hostile attack upon; encroach upon by foray or incursion. Hence—2. To attack in any way; affect injuriously by sudden or covert assault or invasion of any kind: as, to raid a gambling-house. [Colloq.]—To raid the market, to derange prices or the course of trade, as on the stock-exchange, by exciting distrust or uncertainty with regard to values; disturb or depress prices by creating a temporary panic. [Colloq.]

raider (rā′dėr), n. [< raid + -er[1].] One who makes a raid; one engaged in a hostile or predatory incursion.

raign[1]†, v. t. [ME. reynen; by apheresis for arraign[1] (ME. araynen, etc.).] To arraign.

> And many other exstorcioners and promoters in dyuers contreys within the reame was broght to London, and put in to prysons, and reyned at the Gyld Halle with Empson and Dudley. Arnold's Chronicle, p. xliv.

raign[2]†, n. and v. An obsolete spelling of reign.

Raiidæ (rā′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Raia + -idæ.] A family of hypotreme selachians, or Raiæ, typified by the genus Raia; the skates and rays proper. The species have a moderately broad rhombic disk, a more or less acute snout, the tail slender but not whip-like, and surmounted by two small dorsals without spines, and no electrical apparatus. The females are oviparous, eggs inclosed in quadrate corneous capsules being cast. In this respect the Raiidæ differ from all the other ray-like selachians. The species are quite numerous, and every sea has representatives. Formerly the family was taken in a much more extended sense, embracing all the representatives of the suborder except the saw-fishes. Also Rajidæ.

Raiinæ (rā-i′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Raia + -inæ.] A subfamily of rays, coextensive with the family Raiidæ in its most restricted sense.

raikt, v. i. See rake[2].

rail[1] (rāl), n. [< ME. *rail, raile, rayl, *regel, ★regol (in comp. regolsticke, a ruler), partly < AS. regol (not found in sense of 'bar' or 'rail' except as in regolsticca (> ME. regolsticke), a ruler, a straight bar, but common in the derived sense 'a rule of action,' = MD. reghel, rijghel, rijchel, richel, a bar, rail, bolt, later richgel, a bar, shelf, D. rigchel, a bar, = MLG. regel, LG. regel, a rail, cross-bar, = OHG. rigil, MHG. rigel, G. riegel, a bar, bolt, rail, = Sw. regel = Dan. rigel, a bar, bolt; partly < OF. reille, raille, roille, roile, reilhe, relle, rele, a bar, rail, bolt, board, plank, ladder, plow-handle, furrow, row, etc., F. dial. reille, ladder, reille, raille, plowshare (< LG.); < L. regula, a straight piece of wood, a stick, bar, staff, rod, rule, ruler, hence a rule, pattern, model: see rule[1]. Rail[1] is thus a doublet of rule[1], derived through AS., while rule[1] is derived through OF., from the same L. word. Cf. rail[2].] 1. A bar of wood or other material passing from one post or other support to another. Rails, variously secured, as by being mortised to or passing through slots in their supports, etc., are used to form fences and barriers and for many other purposes. In many parts of the United States rail fences are commonly made of rails roughly split from logs and laid zigzag with their ends resting upon one another, every intersection so formed being often supported by a pair of cross-stakes driven into the ground, upon which the top rails rest.

2. A structure consisting of rails and their sustaining posts, balusters, or pillars, and constituting an inclosure or line of division: often used in the plural, and also called a railing. The rails of massive stone, elaborately sculptured, which form the ceremonial inclosures of ancient Buddhist topes, temples, sacred trees, etc., in India, are among the most characteristic and important features of Buddhist architecture, and are the most remarkable works of this class known.

> J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 85.

3. In joinery, a horizontal timber in a piece of framing or paneling. Specifically—(a) In a door, sash, or any paneled work, one of the horizontal pieces between which the panels lie, the vertical pieces being called stiles. See cut under door. (b) The course of pieces into which the upper ends of the balusters of a stair are mortised. (c) In furniture-making and fine joinery, any piece of the construction passing between two posts or other members of the frame: as, the head-rail or foot-rail in a bedstead. Hence—(d) A corresponding member in construction in other materials than wood, as a tie in brass or iron furniture.

4. Naut., one of several bars or timbers in a ship, serving for inclosure or support. The rail, specifically so called, is the fence or upper part of the bulwarks, consisting of a course of molded planks or small timbers mortised to the stanchions, or sometimes to the timber-heads. The part passing round the stern is the taffrail. The forecastle-rail, poop-rail, and top-rail are bars extended on stanchions across the after part of the forecastle-deck, the fore part of the poop, and the after part of each of the tops, respectively. A pin-rail is part of a rail with holes in it for belaying-pins; and a fife-rail is a rail around the lower part of a mast, above the deck, with similar holes. The rails of the head are curved pieces of timber extending from the bows on each side to the hull of the head, for its support.

5. One of the iron or (now generally) steel bars or beams used on the permanent way of a railway to support and guide the wheels of cars and motors. The general form now most in use for steam-railways is that known as the T-rail. But, though these rails all have a section vaguely resembling the letter T, the proportions of the different parts and the weights of the rails are nearly as various as the railways themselves. In the accompanying diagram is shown a section of a rail weighing 75 pounds per yard in length, the weight of the length of one yard being the common mode of stating the weights of rails. These weights are in modern rails sometimes as great as 100 or more pounds per yard, the more recent tendency having been toward heavier locomotives and heavier rails. The cut shows the comparative dimensions of the various parts. (Compare fish-joint, fish-plate, and fish[1], v. t., 8.) The curved junctions of the web with the head and the base are called the fillets.

Section of Rail.

6. The railway or railroad as a means of transport: as, to travel or send goods by rail. [Colloq.]

7. In cotton-spinning, a bar having an up-and-down motion, by which yarn passing through is guided upon the bar and is distributed upon the bobbins.—Adhesion of wheels to rails. See adhesion.—Capped rail. See cap[1].—Compound rail, a railway-rail made in two longitudinal counterparts bolted together in such manner that opposite ends of each project beyond the other part to produce a lapping joint when the rails are spiked to the ties or sleepers. Also called continuous rail.—Double-headed rail, a railway-rail without flanges, with two opposite heads united by a web. It is always used with chairs, and by turning it upside down it can be used after the upper head has become so worn as to be useless.—False rail, in ship-carp., a thin piece of timber attached inside of a curved head-rail in order to strengthen it.—Fish-bellied rail, a cast-iron railway-rail having a convex or downwardly arching under surface to strengthen its middle part, after the manner of some cast-iron beams and girders. It was introduced in 1805.—Flat rail, a railway-rail of cast-iron or wrought-iron fastened by spikes to longitudinal sleepers. The cast-iron flat rail was first used in 1776.—Middle rail, in carp., that rail of a door which is on a level with the hand, and on which the lock is usually fixed, whence it is sometimes called the lock-rail. See cut under door.—Pipe rail, a rail of iron pipe joined by fittings as in pipe-fitting. Such rails, of iron or brass, are now much used in engine-rooms of ships, at the sides of locomotives, on iron bridges, elevated railways, etc.—Pipe-rail fittings, the screw-threaded fittings, including couplings, elbows, crosses, tees, flanges, etc., used in putting together pipe-railings, and usually of an ornamental pattern.—Point-rail, a pointed rail used in the construction of a railway-switch.—Rail-drilling machine, a machine for drilling holes in the web of steel rails for the insertion of fish-plate bolts.—Rail- straightening machine, a portable screw-press for straightening bent or crooked rails or iron bars.—Rail under (naut.), with the lee rail submerged: as, the vessel sailed rail under.—Rolled rail, a rail made of wrought-iron or steel by rolling.—Steel-headed rail, a railway-rail having a wrought-iron base and web and a steel head. Such rails were too expensive for general use, and have given place to the Bessemer-steel rails. Also called steel-topped rail.—Steel rail, a rolled-steel railway-rail. The first steel rails were manufactured in England by Mushet in 1857. The development of the use of steel rails, stimulated by the invention of the celebrated Bessemer process for making cheap mild steel from which rails of far greater durability than those of wrought-iron can be manufactured, has been rapid, and has resulted in the substitution of steel rails for wrought-iron rails on nearly all important railways in the world.—To ride on a rail. See ride.—Virginia rail fence. Same as snake fence (which see, under fence).

rail[1] (rāl), v. [< ME. railen, raylen (= OHG. rigilōn, MHG. rigelen, G. riegeln), rail; cf. OF. reillier, roillier, raillier, inclose with rails, bar; from the noun. Cf. rail[2], v.] I. trans. 1. To inclose with rails: often with in or off.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 150.

2. To furnish with rails; lay the rails of, as a railway; construct a railway upon or along, as a street. [Recent.]

Fifty miles of new road graded last year, which was to receive its rails this spring, will not be railed, because it is not safe for the company to make further investments in that State. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 125.

II. intrans. To fish with a hand-line over the rail of a ship or boat. [Colloq.]

In England, the summer fishing for mackerel is carried on by means of hand lines, and small boats may be seen railing or "whiffing" amongst the schools of mackerel.
Nature, XLI. 180.

rail[2]† (rāl), v. t. [< ME. railen, raylen, < AS. as if regolian* (= D. regelen = G. regeln), set in order, rule, < regol = D. G. Sw. Dan. regel, < L. regula, a rule: see rail[1], and cf. rule[1]. Cf. OF. reillier, roillier, rail, bar, also stripe, from the noun.] To range in a line; set in order.

Al watz rayled on red ryche golde naylez,
That al glytered & glent as glem of the sunne.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 603.

They were brought to London all railed in ropes, like a team of horses in a cart, and were executed, some at London, and the rest at divers places. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII.

Audley, Flammock, Joseph,
The ringleaders of this commotion,
Railed in ropes, fit ornaments for traitors,
Wait your determinations.
Ford, Perkin Warbeck, iii. 1.

rail[3]† (rāl), n. [Early mod. E., also rayle; < ME. rail, reil, regel, < AS. hrægel, hrægl, a garment, dress, robe, pl. clothes, = OS. hregil = OFries. hreil, reyl, reil = OHG. hregil, clothing, garment, dress; root unknown.] 1. A garment; dress; robe: now only in the compound night-rail.—2. A kerchief.

Rayle for a womans neck, crevechief, en quarttre doubles. Palsgrave.

And then a good grey frocke,
A kercheffe, and a raile.
Friar Bacon's Prophesie (1604). (Halliwell.) rail[3]† (rāl), v. t. [ME. railen; < rail[3], v.] To dress; clothe.

Reali railled with wel riche clothes.

★rail[4] (rāl), n. [Early mod. E. rayle; < OF. raale, rasle, F. râle (> G. ralle, ML. rallus), F. dial. reille, a rail; so called from its cry; cf. OF. rasle, F. râle, a rattling in the throat; < OF. raller, F. râler, rattle in the throat, < MD. ratelen, rattle, make a noise: see rattle. Cf. also D. rallen, rellen, make a noise, Sw. ralla, chatter (rallfågel, a rail), Dan. ralle, rattle.] A bird of the subfamily Rallinæ, and especially of the genus Rallus; a water-rail, land-rail, marsh-hen, or crake. Rails are small marsh-loving wading birds, related to coots and gallinules. They abound in the marshes and swamps of most parts of the world, where they thread their way in the mazes of the reeds with great ease and celerity, the body being thin and compressed, and the legs stout and strong with long toes. They nest on the ground, and lay numerous spotted eggs; the young run about as soon as hatched. The common rail of Europe is Rallus aquaticus; the clapper-rail or salt-water marsh-hen of the United States is R. crepitans; the king-rail or fresh-water marsh-hen is R. elegans; the Virginia rail is R. virginianus, also called red rail, little red-breasted rail, lesser clapper-rail, small mud-hen, etc. Very generally, in the United States, the word rail used absolutely means the sora or soree, Porzana carolina, more fully called rail-bird, chicken-billed rail, English rail, Carolina rail, American rail, common rail, sora-rail, ortolan, Carolina crake, crake-gallinule, etc. See Crex, Porzana, and cut under Rallus.—Golden rail, a snipe of the genus Rhynchæa; a painted-snipe or rail-snipe.—Spotted rail, the spotted crake, Porzana maruetta, also called spotted skitty and spotted water-hen.—Weka rail. See Ocydromus.

rail[5] (rāl), v. [Early mod. E. rayle; < OF. railler, F. railler, jest, deride, mock, = Sp. rallar, grate, scrape, vex, molest, = Pg. ralar, scrape, rub, vex, < L. as if radulare*, dim. or freq. of radere, scrape, scratch: see rase[1], raze[1]. Cf. L. rallum (contr. of radlum*), a scraper, radula, a scraping-iron: see radula. Hence rally[2], raillery.] I. intrans. To speak bitterly, opprobriously, or reproachfully; use acrimonious expressions; scoff; inveigh.

Thou raylest on, right withouten reason,
And blamest hem much for small encheason.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., May.

Angels . . . bring not railing accusation against them.
2 Pet. ii. 11.

A certain Spaniard . . . railed . . . extremely at me.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 126.

With God and Fate to rail at suffering easily.
M. Arnold, Empedocles on Etna.

=Syn. of rail at. To upbraid, scold or scold at or scold about, inveigh against, abuse, objurgate. Railing and scolding are always undignified, if not improper; literally, abusing is improper; all three words may by hyperbole be used for talk which is proper.

II.† trans. To scoff at; taunt; scold; banter; affect by railing or raillery.

Till thou canst rail the seals from off my bond,
Thou but offend'st thy lungs to speak so loud.
Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 139.

Such as are capable of goodness are railed into vice, that might as easily be admonished into virtue.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 4.

rail[6]† (rāl), v. i. [Early mod. E. rayle; < ME. railen, reilen, roilen, flow, prob. a var. of roilen, roll, wander: see roil[1].] To run; flow.

Whan the Geaunte felt hym wounded and saugh the blode raile down by the lifte iye, he was nygh wode oute of witte. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 342.

I saw a spring out of a rocke forth rayle,
As clear as Christall gainst the Sunnie beames.
Spenser, Visions of Bellay, l. 155.

rail-bender (rāl'ben″dėr), n. A screw-press or hydraulic press for straightening rails, or for bending them in the construction of railway-curves and -switches. The rail is supported upon two bearers, between which the pressure is applied. Also called rail-bending machine.

rail-bird (rāl'bėrd), n. The Carolina rail or sora, Porzana carolina. [U. S.]

rail-bittern (rāl'bit″ėrn), n. One of the small bitterns of the genus Ardetta, as A. neoxena, which in some respects resemble rails. Coues.

rail-board (rāl'bōrd), n. A board nailed to the rail of a vessel engaged in fishing for mackerel with hand-lines.

rail-borer (rāl'bōr″ėr), n. A hand-drill for making holes in the web of rails for the fish-plate bolts.

rail-brace (rāl'brās), n. A brace used to prevent the turning over of rails or the spreading of tracks at curves, switches, etc., on railways.

rail-chair (rāl'chār), n. An iron block, used especially in Great Britain, by means of which railway-rails are secured to the sleepers. With the flat-bottomed rail common in the United States, chairs are not required, the rails being attached to the ★sleepers by spikes.

Double-headed Rail and Rail-chair, as used on the London and North-Western Railway, England.

a, upper head of rail; a′, lower head of rail; b, chair; c, sleeper; c′, wedge of wood; d, wood-screws; e, spikes.

rail-clamp (rāl'-klamp), n. A wedge or tightening-key for clamping a rail firmly in a rail-chair, so as to prevent lateral play.

rail-coupling (rāl'kup″ling), n. A bar or rod connecting the opposite rails of a railway together at critical points, as curves or switches, where a firmer connection than is afforded by the sleepers is needed.

railer[1] (rā'lėr), n. [< rail[1] + -er[1].] One who makes or furnishes rails.

railer[2] (rā'lėr), n. [Early mod. E. rayler, < F. railleur, railer, jester, < railler, rail, jest, mock: see rail[5].] One who rails, scoffs, insults, censures, or reproaches with opprobrious language.

I am so far off from deserving you,
My beauty so unfit for your affection,
That I am grown the scorn of common railers.
Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, iii. 1.

Junius is never more than a railer, and very often he is third-rate even as a railer. John Morley, Burke, p. 47.

rail-guard (rāl'gärd), n. 1. In English locomotives, one of two stout rods, reaching down to about two inches from the track, before a front wheel. In America the cow-catcher or pilot serves the same purpose.—2. A guard-rail.

railing (rā'ling), n. [< ME. raylynge; verbal n. of rail[1], v.] 1. Rails collectively; a combination of rails; a construction in which rails form an important part. Hence—2. Any openwork construction used as a barrier, parapet, or the like, primarily of wood, but also of iron bars, wire, etc.—Post and railing. See post[1].

railingly (rā'ling-li), adv. In a railing manner; with scoffing or opprobrious language.

railing-post (rā'ling-pōst), n. Same as rail-post.

railipotent (rā-lip'ō-tent), a. [Irreg. < rail[1] + potent, as in omnipotent.] Powerful in railing or vituperation, or as incentive to railing; extremely abusive. [Rare.]

The most preposterous principles have, in requital, shown themselves, as an old author phrases it, valiantly railipotent. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., Pref.

rail-key (rāl'kē), n. A wedge-piece used to clamp a rail to a chair by driving it in between the rail and the chair. Compare rail-clamp.

raillery (rāl'- or ral'ėr-i), n. [Early mod. E. raillerie, ralliery, rallery; < F. raillerie, jesting, mockery, < railler, jest: see rail[5] and rally[2].] 1. Good-humored pleasantry or ridicule; satirical merriment; jesting language; banter.

Let raillery be without malice or heat. B. Jonson.

When you have been Abroad, Nephew, you'll understand Rallery better. Congreve, Way of the World, iii. 16.

That conversation where the spirit of raillery is suppressed will ever appear tedious and insipid.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, i. 1.

2†. A jest. [Rare.]

They take a pleasing raillery for a serious truth.
Gentleman Instructed, p. 13. (Davies.)

railleur (ra-lyėr′), n. [F. railleur, railer, jester, mocker: see railer[2].] One who turns what is serious into ridicule; a jester; a banterer; a mocker.

The family of the railleurs is derived from the same original with the philosophers. The founder of philosophy is confessed by all to be Socrates; and he was also the famous author of all irony.
Bp. Sprat, Hist. Royal Soc.

railly (rā'li), n.; pl. raillies (-liz). [Dim. of rail[3].] Same as rail[3]. [Scotch.]

rail-post (rāl'pōst), n. In carp.: (a) A baluster for a stair-rail, hand-rail, or a balustrade. (b) A newel. Also called railing-post.

rail-punch (rāl'punch), n. A machine for punching holes in the webs of rails, and for analogous uses.

railroad (rāl'rōd), n. [< rail[1] + road.] A road upon which are laid one or more lines of rails to guide and facilitate the movement of vehicles designed to transport passengers or freight, or both. [In this sense the words railroad and railway (which are of about equal age) are synonymous; but the former is more commonly (and preferably) used in the United States, the latter now universally in England. In both countries steam-railroads are called roads, seldom ways. For convenience, the subject of railroads, and the various compound words, are treated in this dictionary under railway.]

The London "Courier," in detailing the advantages of rail-roads upon the locomotive steam engine principle, contains a remark relative to Mr. Rush, our present minister in London . . . : "Whatever parliament may do, they cannot stop the course of knowledge and improvement! The American government has possessed itself, through its minister, of the improved mode of constructing and making rail-roads, and there can be no doubt of their immediate adoption throughout that country."
Niles's Register, April 2, 1825.

Alas! even the giddiness attendant on a journey on this Manchester rail-road is not so perilous to the nerves as that too frequent exercise in the merry-go-round of the ideal world.
Scott, Count Robert of Paris, Int., p. xi. (Oct. 15, 1831).

On Monday I shall set off for Liverpool by the railroad, which will then be opened the whole way.
Macaulay, in Trevelyan, II. 20.

Lady Buchan of Athlone writes thus in 1833: "I have a letter from Sir John, who strongly recommends my going by the railroad." N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 379.

Commissioner of Railroads. See commissioner.—Elevated railroad. See railway.—Railroad euchre. See euchre.—Underground railroad. (a) See underground railway, under railway. (b) In the United States before the abolition of slavery, a secret arrangement for enabling slaves to escape into free territory, by passing them along from one point of concealment to another till they reached Canada or some other place of safety.

★railroad (rāl'rōd), v. t. [< railroad, n.] To hasten or push forward with railroad speed; expedite rushingly; rush: as, to railroad a bill through a legislature. [Slang, U. S.]

A New York daily some time ago reported that a common thief . . . was railroaded through court in a few days. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXII. 758.

railroader (rāl′rō-dėr), n. A person engaged in the management or operation of a railroad or railroads; one employed in or about the running of railroad-trains or the general business of a railroad. [U. S.]

The Inter-State Commerce Commission is endeavoring to harmonise the interests of shippers and railroaders.
The Engineer, LXVI. 18.

railroading (rāl′rō-ding), n. [< railroad + -ing[1].] The management of or work upon a railroad or railroads; the business of constructing or operating railroads. [U. S.]

Wonders in the science of railroading that the tourist will go far to see.
Harper's Weekly, XXXIII., Supp., p. 60.

railroad-worm (rāl′rōd-wėrm), n. The apple-maggot (larva of Trypeta pomonella): so called because it has spread along the lines of the railroads. [New Eng.]

rail-saw (rāl′sâ), n. A portable machine for sawing off railway-rails in track-laying and -repairing. The most approved form clamps to the rail to be sawn, its frame carrying a reciprocating segmental saw working on a rock-shaft, which is operated by laterally extending detachable rock-levers. It has mechanism which moves the saw toward the rail. Another type employs a circular saw operated by a hand-crank and gearing.

rail-snipe (rāl′snīp), n. A bird of the genus Rhynchæa (or Rostratula), as R. capensis, the Cape rail-snipe, also called painted Cape snipe and golden rail.

rail-splitter (rāl′split″ėr), n. One who splits logs into rails for making a rail fence. Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States from 1861 to 1865, who in his youth had occasionally split rails, was sometimes popularly called the rail-splitter, and clubs of his partizans assumed the name Rail-splitters. [U. S.]

Yes: he had lived to shame me from my sneer,
To lame my pencil, and confute my pen;
To make me own this hind of princes peer,
This rail-splitter a true-born king of men.
Tom Taylor, Abraham Lincoln.

★railway (rāl′wā), n. [< rail[1] + way.] 1. In mech. engin., broadly, a way composed of one or more rails, or lines of rails, for the support, and commonly also for the direction of the motion, of a body carried on wheels adapted to roll on the rail or rails, or lines of rails. The wheels of railway-cars are now more usually flanged; but in railways forming parts of machines they are sometimes grooved, or they may run in grooves formed in the rails.

2. A way for the transportation of freight or passengers, or both, in which vehicles with flanged or grooved wheels are drawn or propelled on one or more lines of rails that support the wheels of the vehicles, and guide their course by the lateral pressure of the rails against the wheels; a railroad. (See railroad.) The parts of an ordinary passenger- and freight-railway proper are the road-bed, ballast, sleepers, rails, culverts, bridges, tunnels, switches and switch mechanism, collectively called permanent way, and the signals; but in common and accepted usage the meaning of the terms railway and railroad has been extended to include not only the permanent way, but everything necessary to its operation, as the rolling-stock and buildings, including stations, warehouses, round-houses, locomotive-shops, car-shops, and repair-shops, and also all other property of the operating company, as stocks, bonds, and other securities. Railways are divided by their motive power into steam roads and electric roads and are also classified as mineral, coal, or logging roads, passenger and freight roads, through lines, and suburban lines. Extensive lines having many branches under one management are sometimes called systems, as the Pennsylvania system. Electric roads may be sections or branches of steam roads or independent roads with express and local service or urban and suburban passenger service. Some electric roads are combined elevated, subway, and surface roads. Horse railroads have been almost completely superseded by electric roads. Cable-roads are now only used on steep hillsides and on inclined planes in mountain ranges or at pleasure resorts. The term railway is also applied to trackways in streets, formed by broad flat rails laid level with the pavement and designed to furnish a smooth track for ordinary trucks and other horse-drawn vehicles. In a broad sense any trackway is a railway, as the tracks of a traveling crane, a traveling ladder, conveyer, hoist, etc. See ★telpherage, ★crane, ★hoist.—Abandonment of railway. See abandonment.—Aërial, Archimedean, atmospheric, centripetal, electric railway. See the adjectives.—Elevated railway, or elevated railroad, in contradistinction to surface railway, an elevated structure, in form analogous to a bridge, used in New York and elsewhere for railway purposes, to avoid obstruction of surface roadways. The elevated structures are usually made of a good quality of steel and iron, and cars are moved on them either by steam-locomotives or by cable-traction, more commonly the former. Electricity has also been applied to the propulsion of cars on elevated railways.—Inclined railway, a railway having such a steep grade that special means other than ordinary locomotive driving-wheels are necessary for drawing or propelling cars on it. The use of locomotives with gripping-wheels engaging a rail extending midway between the ordinary rails, or having a pinion engaging the teeth of a rack-rail similarly placed, is a feature of many such railways. Cables operated by a stationary engine are also used.—Marine railway. See marine.—Military railway, a railway equipped for military service. Armored locomotives, and armor-plated cars having port-holes for rifles and some of them carrying swivel-guns, are prominent features of a military railway outfit.—Pneumatic railway. (a) A railway in which cars are propelled by air-pressure behind them. In one form of pneumatic railway the cars were pushed like pistons through a tunnel by pressure of air on the rear. The system failed of practical success from the difficulties met with in the attempt to carry it out on a large scale. Also called atmospheric railway (which see, under atmospheric). (b) A railway in which cars are drawn by pneumatic locomotives. Scarcely more success has been reached in this method than in that described above.—Portable railway, or portable railroad, a light railway-track made in detachable sections, or otherwise constructed so that it may be easily taken up, carried about, and transported to a distance, for use in military operations, in constructing roads, in building operations, in making excavations, etc. The rails are frequently of wood, or of wood plated with iron.—Prismoidal railway, a railway consisting of a single continuous beam or truss supported on posts or columns. The engine and cars run astride of the beam, the former being provided with grip-wheels to obtain the hold on the track requisite for draft.—Railway brain, a term applied to certain cases developed by railway accident, in which a traumatic neurosis is believed to be of cerebral origin.—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, an English statute of 1845 (8 and 9 Vict., c. 20) consolidating the usual statutory provisions applicable to railway corporations, enabling them to take private property, and giving them special rights or special duties.—Railway cut-off saw. See saw[1].—Railway post-office. See post-office.—Railway scrip. See scrip.—Railway spine, an affection of the spine resulting from concussion produced by a railway accident. See under spine.

The railway spine has taken its place in medical nomenclature. Sci. Amer., N. S., LX. 22.

Underground railway, a railway running through a continuous tunnel, as under the streets or other parts of a city; a subterranean railway.

railway-car (rāl′wā-kär), n. Any vehicle in general (the locomotive or other motor and its tender excepted) that runs on a railway, whether for the transportation of freight or of passengers.

railway-carriage (rāl′wā-kar″āj), n. A railway-car for passenger-traffic. [Eng.]

railway-chair (rāl′wā-chār), n. Same as rail-chair.

railway-company (rāl′wā-kum″pạ-ni), n. A stock company, usually organized under a charter granted by special legislative enactment, for the purpose of constructing and operating a railway, and invested with certain special powers, as well as subject to special restrictions, by the terms of its charter.

railway-crossing (rāl′wā-krôs″ing), n. 1. An intersection of railway-tracks.—2. The intersection of a common roadway or highway with the track of a railway.

railway-frog (rāl′wā-frog), n. See frog[2], 2.

railway-slide (rāl′wā-slīd), n. A turn-table. [Eng.]

railway-stitch (rāl′wā-stich), n. 1. In crochet, same as tricot-stitch.—2. In embroidery, a simple stitch usually employed in white embroidery, or with floss or filoselle.—3. In worsted-work or Berlin-wool work, a kind of stitch used on leviathan canvas, large and loose, and covering the surface quickly.

railway-switch (rāl′wā-swich), n. See switch.

railway-tie (rāl′wā-tī), n. See tie.

railway-train (rāl′wā-trān), n. See train.

raim (rām), v. t. Same as ream[2].

raiment (rā′ment), n. [Early mod. E. rayment; < ME. raiment, rayment, short for arayment, later arraiment, mod. arrayment: see arrayment. Cf. ray, by apheresis for array.] That in which one is arrayed or clad; clothing; vesture; formerly sometimes, in the plural, garments. [Now only poetical or archaic.]

On my knees I beg
That you'll vouchsafe me raiment, bed, and food.
Shak., Lear, ii. 4. 158.

Truth's Angel on horseback, his raiment of white silk powdered with stars of gold.
Middleton, Triumphs of Truth.

=Syn. Clothes, dress, attire, habiliments, garb, costume, array. These words are all in current use, while raiment and vesture have a poetic or antique sound.

raimondite (rā′mon-dīt), n. [Named after A. Raimondi, an Italian scientist who spent many years in exploring Peru.] A basic sulphate of iron, occurring in hexagonal tabular crystals of a yellow color.

★rain[1] (rān), n. [Early mod. E. rayne, < ME. rein, reyn, reyne, reane, regn, rien, ren, ran, < AS. regn (often contr. rēn) = OS. regan, regin = OFries. rein = D. regen = MLG. regen = OHG. regan, MHG. regen, G. regen = Icel. Sw. Dan. regn = Goth. rign, rain; cf. L. rigare, moisten (see irrigation), Gr. βρέχειν, wet (see embrocation).] 1. The descent of water in drops through the atmosphere, or the water thus falling. In general, clouds constitute the reservoir from which rain descends, but the fall of rain in very small quantities from a cloudless sky is occasionally observed. The aqueous vapor of the atmosphere, which condenses into cloud, and falls as rain, is derived from the evaporation of water, partly from land, but chiefly from the vast expanse of the ocean. At a given temperature, only a certain amount of aqueous vapor can be contained in a given volume, and when this amount is present the air or more properly the space or volume is said to be saturated. If the air or more precisely the vapor is then cooled below this temperature, a part of the vapor will be condensed into small drops, which, when suspended in the atmosphere, constitute clouds. By some process, not yet clearly demonstrated, larger drops are formed and fall as rain. Sometimes the rate of condensation is so great that the water appears to fall in sheets rather than in drops, and then the storm is popularly called a cloud-burst. It is now generally held that dynamic cooling (that is, the cooling of air by expansion, when raised in altitude, and thereby brought under diminished pressure), if not the sole cause of rain, is the only cause of any importance, and that other causes popularly appealed to—such as the intermingling of warm and cold air, contact with cold mountain-slopes, etc.—are either inoperative or relatively insignificant. The requisite ascent of air may be occasioned either by convection currents, a cyclonic circulation, or the upward deflection of horizontal currents by hills or mountains; and rain may be classified as convective, cyclonic, or orographic, according as the first, second, or third of these methods is brought into operation to produce it. It is also classified as monsoonal, seasonal, and annual, since in some regions it is more or less evenly distributed throughout the year, in others it is confined to a part of the year (the rainy season), and in others still it is entirely absent, or too slight for need, according to variation of local atmospheric conditions. As opposed to the views of Espy, Bigelow has maintained that precipitation forms when masses of warm moist air come into direct contact with and cool by the intermixture of large masses of cool air rather than when the cooling is due to radiation or to adiabatic cooling by expansion. See the supplement. In a ship's log-book abbreviated r.

A muchel wind alith mid a lutel rein.
Ancren Riwle, p. 246.

Also a man that was born in thys yle told vs that they had no Rayne by the space of x months; they sow ther whete with owt Rayne.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 61.

2. Figuratively—(a) A fall of any substance through the atmosphere in the manner of rain, as of blossoms or of the pyrotechnic stars from rockets and other fireworks. Blood-rain is a fall of fragments of red algæ or the like, raised in large quantities by the wind and afterward precipitated. Sulphur-rain or yellow rain is a similar precipitation of the pollen of fir-trees, etc. (b) A shower, downpour, or abundant outpouring of anything.

Whilst Wealth it self doth roll
In to her bosom in a golden Rain.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, i. 38.

The former and the latter rain, in Palestine, the rains of autumn and of spring; hence, rain in its due season.—The Rains†, a tract of the Atlantic ocean formerly so called. See the quotation.

Crossing toward the west, from Africa, it is now known that between about five and fifteen north latitude is a space of ocean, nearly triangular, the other limit being about twenty (long.) and ten (lat.), which used to be called by the earlier navigators the Rains, on account of the calms and almost incessant rain always found there.
Fitz Roy, Weather Book, p. 115.

=Syn. 1. Rain, Haze, Fog, Mist, Cloud. A cloud resting upon the earth is called mist or fog. In mist the globules are very fine, but are separately distinguishable, and have a visible motion. In fog the particles are separately indistinguishable, and there is no perceptible motion. A dry fog is composed largely of dust-particles on which the condensed vapor is too slight to occasion any sense of moisture. Haze differs from fog and cloud in the greater microscopic minuteness of its particles. It is visible only as a want of transparency of the atmosphere, and in general exhibits neither form, boundary, nor locus. Thus, among haze, fog, mist, and rain, the size of the constituent particles or globules is a discriminating characteristic, though frequently cloud merges into fog or mist, and mist into rain, by insensible gradations.

rain[1] (rān), v. [< ME. raynen, reinen, reynen, regnen, rinen, rynen (pret. rainde, reinede, rinde; sometimes strong, ron, roon), < AS. rignan, rarely regnan, usually contracted rīnan, rȳnan (pret. rīnde; rarely strong, rān), = D. regenen = MLG. regenen = OHG. reganōn, regonōn, MHG. regenen, G. regnen = Icel. regna, rigna = Sw. regna = Dan. regne = Goth. rignjan, rain; from the noun: see rain[1], n.] I. intrans. 1. To fall in drops through the air, as water: generally used impersonally.

There it reyneth not but litylle in that Contree; and for that Cause they have no Watre, but zif it be of that Flood of that Ryvere. Mandeville, Travels, p. 45.

Evermore so sternliche it ron,
And blew therwith so wonderliche loude,
That wel neighe no man heren other koude.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 677.

And in Elyes tyme heuene was yclosed,

Piers Plowman (B), xiv. 66.

The rain it raineth every day Shak., T. N., v. 1. 401.

2. To fall or drop like rain: as, tears rained from their eyes.

The Spaniards presented a fatal mark to the Moorish missiles, which rained on them with pitiless fury.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 7.

Down rained the blows upon the unyielding oak.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 252.

II. trans. To pour or shower down, like rain from the clouds; pour or send down abundantly.

Behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you.
Ex. xvi. 4.

Does he rain gold, and precious promises,
Into thy lap? Fletcher, Wife for a Month, i. 1.

Why, it rains princes; though some people are disappointed of the arrival of the Pretender.
Walpole, Letters, II. 24.

To rain cats and dogs. See cat[1].

rain[2] (rān), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. A ridge. Halliwell.—2. A furrow. [Prov. Eng. in both senses.]

They reaped the corne that grew in the raine to serve that turne, as the corne in the ridge was not readie.
Wynne, History of the Gwedir Family, p. 87. (Encyc. Dict.) rain[3]†, n. An obsolete spelling of rein[1].

rainball (rān'bâl), n. One of the festoons of the mammato-cumulus, or pocky cloud: so called because considered to be a sign of rain. [Prov. Eng.]

rainband (rān'band), n. A dark band in the solar spectrum, situated on the red side of the D line, and caused by the absorption of that part of the spectrum by the aqueous vapor of the atmosphere. The intensity of the rainband varies with the amount of vapor in the air, and is thus of some importance as an indication of rain. Direct-vision spectroscopes of moderate dispersion are best adapted for observing it. Pocket instruments of this kind, designed for the purpose, are called rainband-spectroscopes.

At every hour, when there is sufficient light, the intensity of the rainband is observed and recorded.
Nature, XXXV. 589.

rain-bird (rān'bȅrd), n. [< ME. reyne-bryde; < rain[1] + bird[1].] A bird supposed to foretell rain by its cries or actions, as the rain-crow. Many birds become noisy or uneasy before rain, the popular belief having thus considerable foundation in fact. (a) The green woodpecker, Gecinus viridis. Also rain-fowl, rain-pie. [Eng.] (b) The large ground-cuckoo of Jamaica, Saurothera vetula; also, a related cuckoo, Piaya pluvialis.

rainbow (rān'bō), n. [< ME. reinbowe, reinboge, renboge, < AS. regn-boga, rēnboga (= OFries. reinboga = D. regenboog = MLG. regenboge, regensboge (cf. LG. water-boog) = OHG. reganbogo, MHG. regenboge, G. regenbogen = Icel. regnbogi = Sw. regnbåge = Dan. regnbue), < regn, rain, + boga, bow: see rain[1] and bow[3], n.] 1. A bow, or an arc of a circle, consisting of the prismatic colors, formed by the refraction and reflection of rays of light from drops of rain or vapor, appearing in the part of the heavens opposite to the sun. When large and strongly illuminated, the rainbow presents the appearance of two concentric arches, the inner being called the primary and the outer the secondary rainbow. Each is formed of the colors of the solar spectrum, but the colors are arranged in reversed order, the red forming the exterior ring of the primary bow and the interior of the secondary. The primary bow is formed by rays of the sun that enter the upper part of falling drops of rain, and undergo two refractions and one reflection; the secondary, by rays that enter the under part of rain-drops, and undergo two refractions and two reflections. Hence, the colors of the secondary bow are fainter than those of the primary. The rainbow is regarded as a symbol of divine beneficence toward man, from its being made the token of the covenant that the earth should never again be destroyed by a flood (Gen. ix. 13–17). Smaller bows, sometimes circular and very brilliant, are often seen through masses of mist or spray, as from a waterfall or from waves about a ship. (See fog-bow.) The moon sometimes forms a bow or arch of light, more faint than that formed by the sun, and called a lunar rainbow.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 2.

Intersecting rainbows are not uncommon. They require, of course, for their production, two sources of parallel rays; and they are seen when, behind the spectator, there is a large sheet of calm water. Tait, Light, § 165.

2. In her., the representation of a half-ring divided into seven concentric narrow rings and arched upward, each end resting on a clump of clouds. To avoid the difficulty of finding seven different tinctures, the number of concentric rings is sometimes diminished to three, usually azure, or, and gules—that is, blue, gold, and red.

3. In ornith., a humming-bird of the genus Diphlogena, containing two most brilliantly plumaged species, D. iris of Bolivia, and D. hesperus of Ecuador.—4. The rainbow-fish.—Rainbow style, a method of calico-printing in which the colors are blended with one another at the edges.—Spurious or supernumerary rainbow, a bow always seen in connection with a fine rainbow, lying close inside the violet of the primary bow, or outside that of the secondary one. Its colors are fainter and less pure, as they proceed from the principal bow, and finally merge in the diffused white light of the primary bow, and outside the secondary.

rainbow-agate (rān'bō-ag″āt), n. An iridescent variety of agate.

rainbow-darter (rān'bō-där″tėr), n. The soldier-fish or blue darter, Etheostoma cæruleum, of gorgeous and varied colors, about 2½ inches long, found in the waters of the Mississippi basin; as a book-name, any species of this genus.

rainbowed (rān'bōd), a. [< rainbow + -ed[2].] 1. Formed by or like a rainbow.—2. Encircled with a rainbow or halo. Davies.

See him stand
Before the altar, like a rainboved saint.
Kingsley, Saint's Tragedy, i. 3.

★rainbow-fish (rān'bō-fish), n. One of several different fishes of bright or varied coloration. (a) The blue darter, Etheostoma cæruleum. [U. S.] (b) A scaroid fish, Scarus quadrispinosus. [Bermuda.]

rainbow-hued, rainbow-tinted (rān'bō-hūd, -tin″ted), a. Having hues or tints like those of a rainbow.

rainbow-quartz (rān'bō-kwârts), n. An iridescent variety of quartz.

★rainbow-trout (rān'bō-trout), n. The California mountain trout, Salmo irideus. It is closely related to the brook-trout of Europe, but not to that of the eastern United States. It has been quite widely distributed by pisciculturists. In the breeding season the side has a red stripe, giving rise to the popular name.

Rainbow-trout (Salmo irideus).

rainbow-worm (rān'bō-wȅrm), n. A species of tetter, the herpes iris of Bateman.

rainbow-wrasse (rān'bō-ras), n. A labroid fish, Julis julis, the only British species of that genus: so called from its bright and varied colors.

rain-box (rān'boks), n. A device in a theater for producing an imitation of the sound of falling rain.

rain-chamber (rān'chām″bėr), n. An attachment to a furnace, hearth, or smelting-works in which the fumes of any metal, as lead, are partly or entirely condensed by the aid of water.

rain-cloud (rān'kloud), n. Any cloud from which rain falls: in meteorology called nimbus. Two general classes may be distinguished—(a) cumulo-nimbus, where rain falls from cumulus clouds, generally in squalls or showers, and (b) strato-nimbus, where rain falls from stratus clouds. The name is sometimes especially given, in a more restricted sense, to the ragged, detached masses of cumulus (called by Poey fracto-cumulus), or to the low, torn fragments of cloud called scud, which are characteristic associates of rain-storms. See cut under cloud.

rain-crow (rān'krō), n. A tree-cuckoo of the genus Coccygus, either C. americanus or C. erythrophthalmus: so named from its cries, often heard in lowering weather, and supposed to predict rain. [Local, U. S.]

rain-door (rān'dōr), n. In Japanese houses, one of the external sliding doors or panels in a veranda which are closed in stormy weather and at night.

raindrop (rān'drop), n. [< ME. raindrope (also reines drope), < AS. regndropa (= D. dim. regendroppel, regendruppel = OHG. regentropho, MHG. G. regentropfen = Sw. regndroppe = Dan. regndraabe, raindrop), < regn, rain, + dropa, drop: see rain[1] and drop, n.] A drop of rain.—Raindrop glaze, in ceram., a glaze with very slight drop-like bosses, used for porcelain.

raine†, n. An obsolete spelling of reign.

raines[1]†, n. pl. An obsolete spelling of reins.

raines[2]†, n. [Also raynes, reins; < Rennes (see def.).] A kind of linen or lawn, manufactured at Rennes in France.

She should be apparelled beautifully with pure white silk, or with most fine raines.
Bale, Select Works, p. 542. (Davies.)

rainfall (rān'fâl), n. 1. A falling of rain; a shower.—2. The precipitation of water from clouds; the water, or the amount of water, coming down as rain. The rainfall is measured by means of the pluviometer or rain-gage. The average rainfall of a district includes the snow, if any, reduced to its equivalent in water.—Rainfall chart, an isohyetal chart. See isohyetal.

rain-fowl (rān'foul), n. [< ME. reyn fowle; < rain[1] + fowl[1].] 1. Same as rain-bird (a). [Eng.]—2. The Australian Scythrops novæhollandiæ.

★rain-gage (rān'gāj), n. An instrument for collecting and measuring the amount of rainfall at a given place. Many forms have been used; their size has been a few square inches or square feet in area, and their material has been sheet-metal, porcelain, wood, or glass. The form adopted by the United States Signal Service consists of three parts—(a) a funnel-shaped receiver, having a turned brass rim 8 inches in diameter; (b) a collecting tube, made of seamless brass tubing of 2.53 inches inside diameter, making its area one tenth that of the receiving surface; and (c) a galvanized iron overflow-cylinder, which in time of snow is used alone as a snow-gage. A cedar measuring-stick is used to measure the depth of water collected in the gage. By reason of the ratio between the area of the collecting tube and that of the receiving surface, the depth of rain is one tenth that measured on the stick. See cut under pluviometer.

rain-goose (rān'gös), n. The red-throated diver or loon, Urinator or Colymbus septentrionalis, supposed to foretell rain by its cry. [Local, British.]

rain-hound† (rān'hound), n. A variety of the hound. See the quotation.

Mastiffs are often mentioned in the proceedings at the Forest Courts [in England], in company with other breeds which it is not easy now to identify, such as the rain-hound, which keeps watch by itself in rainy weather.
The Academy, Feb. 4, 1888, p. 71.

raininess (rā'ni-nes), n. [< rainy + -ness.] The state of being rainy.

rainless (rān'les), a. [< rain[1] + -less.] Without rain: as, a rainless region; a rainless zone.

★rain-maker (rān'mā″kėr), n. 1. A person believed to have the power of producing a fall of rain by incantation or supernatural means.

The African chief, with his rain-makers and magicians.
The Century, XL. 303.

2. One who attempts to produce rain by mechanical means.

rainment† (rān'mẹnt), n. An aphetic form of arraignment.

rain-paddock (rān'pad″ọk), n. The batrachian Breviceps gibbosus, of South Africa, which lives in holes in the ground and comes out in wet weather.

rain-pie (rān'pī), n. Same as rain-bird (a). [Eng.]

rainpour (rān'pōr), n. A downpour of rain; a heavy rainfall. [Colloq.]

The red light of flitting lanterns blotched the steady rainpour. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 572.

rain-print (rān'print), n. In geol., the print of raindrops in some aqueous rocks, formed when they were in a soft state, such as may be seen on a muddy or sandy sea-beach after a heavy shower. It is possible for the geologist to tell by inspection of the prints from what direction the wind was blowing at the time of their formation.

rain-proof (rān'prōf), n. Proof against rain; not admitting the entrance of rain or penetration by it; rain-tight; water-proof in a shower.

Their old temples, . . . which for long have not been rain-proof, crumble down. Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, ii. 7.

★rain-quail (rān'kwāl), n. The quail Coturnix coromandelicus, of Africa and India, whose migrations are related in some way to rainy seasons.

rain-storm (rān'stôrm), n. A storm of rain; a rain.

The fells sweep skyward with a fine breadth, freshened by strong breezes; clouds and sunshine, ragged rainstorms, thunder and lightning, chase across them forever.
The Atlantic, LXV. 824.

rain-tight (rān'tīt), a. So tight as to exclude rain.

rain-tree (rān'trē), n. The genisaro or guango, Pithecolobium Saman. It is said to be so called because occasionally in South America, through the agency of cicadas which suck its juices, it sheds moisture to such an extent as to wet the ground. Another explanation is that its foliage shuts up at night, so that the rain and dew are not retained by it. See genisaro.

rain-wash (rān'wosh), n. See wash.

rain-water (rān'wâ″tėr), n. [< ME. reyne water, reinwater, < AS. regnwæter, rēnwæter* (= OHG. reganwazar), < regn, rēn, rain, + wæter, water: see rain[1] and water.] Water that has fallen from the clouds in rain, and has not sunk into the earth.

No one has a right to build his house so as to cause the rain water to fall over his neighbour's land, . . . unless he has acquired a right by a grant or prescription.
Bouvier, Law Dict., II. 419.

rainy (rā′ni), a. [< late ME. rayne, < AS. regnig*, rēnig, rainy, < regn, rēn, rain: see rain[1].] Abounding with or giving out rain; dropping with or as if with rain; showery: as, rainy weather; a rainy day or season; a rainy sky.

A continual dropping in a very rainy day.
Prov. xxvii. 15.

To reysen up a rente
That longeth to my lordes duetee.
Chaucer, Friar's Tale, l. 90.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Raise, Lift, Erect, Elevate, Exalt, Heighten, Heave, Hoist. Raise is the most general and the most freely figurative of these words, and in its various uses represents all the rest, and also many others, as shown in the definitions. Lift is peculiar in implying the exercise of physical or mechanical force, moving the object generally a comparatively short distance upward, but breaking completely its physical contact with the place where it was. To lift a ladder is to take it wholly off the ground, if only an inch; to raise a ladder, we may lift one end and carry it up till it is supported in some way. To lift one's head or arm is a more definite and energetic act than to raise it. We lift a child over a place; we raise one that has fallen. To erect is to set up perpendicularly: as, to erect a flagstaff. To elevate is to raise relatively, generally by an amount not large; the word is often no more than a dignified synonym for raise. To exalt is to raise to dignity; the word is thus used in a physical sense in Isa. xl. 4, "Every valley shall be exalted," and elsewhere in the Bible; but the figurative or moral sense has now become the principal one, so that the other seems antique. To heighten is to increase in height, either physically or morally: he whom we esteem already is heightened in our esteem by an especially honorable act. To heave is to raise slowly and with effort, and sometimes to throw in like fashion. To hoist is to raise a thing of some weight with some degree of slowness or effort, generally with mechanical help, to a place: as, to hoist a rock, or a flag.—14. Rear, Bring up, Raise. To rear offspring through their tenderer years till they can take care of themselves; to bring up a child in the way he should go; to raise oats and other products of the soil; to raise horses and cattle. Where were you brought up? not, where were you raised? The use of raise in application to persons is a vulgarism. Rear applies only to physical care; bring up applies more to training or education in mind and manners.

II. intrans. To bring up phlegm, bile, or blood from the throat, lungs, or stomach. [Colloq.]

raise[1] (rāz), n. [< raise[1], v.] 1. Something raised, elevated, or built up; an ascent; a rise; a pile; a cairn. [Prov. Eng.]

There are yet some considerable remains of stones which still go by the name of raises.

Philadelphia Times, April 6, 1886.

3. A raising or enlarging in amount; an increase or advance: as, a raise of wages; a raise of the stakes in gaming. [Colloq.]—4. An acquisition; a getting or procuring by special effort, as of money or chattels: as, to make a raise of a hundred dollars. [Colloq.]

raise[2] (rāz). A dialectal (Scotch) preterit of rise.

raiser (rā′zėr), n. [< raise[1] + -er[1].] 1. A person who raises or is occupied in raising anything, as buildings, plants, animals, etc.

A raiser of huge melons and of pine.
Tennyson, Princess, Conclusion.

The head of the Victor Verdier type [of roses] originated with the greatest of all the raisers, Lacharme, of Lyons.
The Century, XXVI. 351.

2. That which raises; a device of any kind used for raising, lifting, or elevating anything: as, a water-raiser. Specifically—(a) In carp., same as riser. (b) In a vehicle, a support or stay of wood or metal under the front seat, or some material placed under the trimmings to give them greater thickness. (c) In whale-fishing, a contrivance for raising or buoying up a dead whale.

raisin (rā′zn), n. [< ME. raisin, reisin, reysyn, reysone, reysynge, a cluster of grapes, also a dried grape, raisin, = D. razijn, rozijn = MLG. rosīn = MHG. rasin, rosine, G. rosine = Dan. rosin = Sw. russin (ML. rosina), raisin; < OF. raisin, reisin, a cluster of grapes, a grape, a dried grape (raisins de cabas, dried grapes, raisins), F. raisin, dial. rasin, roisin, rosin, grapes (un grain de raisin, a grape; raisins de caisse, raisins), = Pr. razim, rozim, razain = Cat. rahim = Sp. racimo = Pg. racimo = It. racemo (dim. racimolo), a cluster of grapes, < L. racemus, a cluster of grapes: see raceme, a doublet of raisin.] 1†. A cluster of grapes; also, a grape.

Nether in the vyneyerd thou schalt gadere reysyns and greynes fallynge doun, but thou schalt leeve to be gaderid of pore men and pilgryms.
Wyclif, Lev. xix. 10. (Trench.)

2. A dried grape of the common Old World species, Vitis vinifera. Only certain saccharine varieties of the grape, however, thriving in special localities, are available for raisins. A large part of the ordinary large raisins is produced on a narrow tract in Mediterranean Spain. These are sometimes classed as Malaga raisins, but this name belongs more properly to the "dessert-raisins" grown about Malaga: they are also called muscatels from the variety of grape, blooms from retaining a glaucous surface, and, in part at least, raisins of the sun or sun-raisins because dried on the vine, the leaves being removed, and sometimes the cluster-stem half-severed. When packed between sheets of paper, these are known as layer raisins. Raisins suitable for cookery, or "pudding-raisins," sometimes called lexias, are produced especially at Valencia. These are cured, after cutting from the vine, in the sun, or in bad weather in heated chambers, the quality in the latter case being inferior. The clusters are often dipped in potash lye to soften the skin, favor drying, and impart a gloss. Excluding the "Corinthian raisin" (see below), the next most important source of raisins is the vicinity of Smyrna, including Chesme, near Chios. Here are produced nearly all the sultanas, small seedless raisins with a golden-yellow delicate skin and sweet aromatic flavor. Raisins are also a product of Persia, of Greece, Italy, and southern France, of the Cape of Good Hope, Australia, and California. No variety of native American grape has yet been developed suitable for the preparation of raisins. See raisin-wine.

Then Abigail made haste, and took . . . an hundred clusters of raisins. 1 Sam. xxv. 18.

I must have saffron to colour the warden pies; . . . four pounds of prunes, and as many of raisins o' the sun.
Shak., W. T., iv. 3. 51.

Black Smyrna raisin, a small black variety of raisin with large seeds.—Corinthian raisin, the currant, or Zante currant, the dried fruit of the variety Corinthiaca of the grape. The cluster is about three inches long, and the berry is not larger than a pea. It is produced in very large quantities in the Morea and the neighboring islands, and is consumed in baking and cookery.—Eleme raisin, a Smyrna raisin of good size and quality, hand-picked from the stem, used chiefly for ships' stores or sent to distant markets.

raising (rā′zing), n. [< ME. reysynge; verbal n. of raise[1], v.] 1. The act of lifting, elevating, etc. (in any sense of the verb). Specifically—(a) An occasion on which the frame of a new building, the pieces of which have been previously prepared, but require many hands to put into place, is raised with the help of neighbors. See house-raising and raising-bee. [Rural, U. S.] (b) In metal-work, the embossing or ornamentation of sheet-metal by hammering, spinning, or stamping. (c) A method of treating hides with acids to cause them to swell and to open the pores in order to hasten the process of tanning. (d) In dyeing, the process or method of intensifying colors.

2. Same as raising-piece.

Franke-posts, raisins, beames . . . and such principals.
W. Harrison, Descrip. of England, ii. 12.

raising-piece (rā′zing-pēs), n. In carp., a piece of timber laid on a brick wall, or on the top of the posts or puncheons of a timber-framed house, to carry a beam or beams; a templet.

raising-plate (rā′zing-plāt), n. In carp., a horizontal timber resting on a wall, or upon vertical timbers of a frame, and supporting the heels of rafters or other framework; a wall-plate.

raisin-tree (rā′zn-trē), n. The common currant-shrub, Ribes rubrum, the fruit of which is often confounded with the Corinthian raisin, or currant. [Prov. Eng.]—Japanese raisin-tree, a small rhamnaceous tree, Hovenia dulcis. The peduncle of its fruit is edible.

raisin-wine (rā′zn-wīn), n. Wine manufactured from dried grapes. Malaga wine is mostly of this kind, and the Tokay of Hungary is made from partly dried fruit. Raisin-wine was known to the ancients.

raison d'être (rā-zôṅ′ dā′tr). [F.: raison, reason; d' for de, of, for; être, being, < être, be.] Reason or excuse for being; rational cause or ground for existence.

raisonné (rā-zo-nā′), a. [< F. raisonné, pp. of raisonner, reason, prove or support by reasoning, arguments, etc.: see reason[1], v.] Reasoned out; systematic; logical: occurring in English use chiefly in the phrase catalogue raisonné (which see, under catalogue).

raivel (rāvl), n. A Scotch form of ravel[1], 3.

raj (rāj), n. [Hind. rāj, rule, < Skt. √ rāj, rule. Cf. raja[2].] Rule; dominion. [India.]

But Delhi had fallen when these gentlemen threw their strength into the tide of revolt, and they were too late for a decisive superiority over the British rāj.
Capt. M. Thomson, Story of Cawnpore, xvi.

Raja[1], n. Same as Raia.

raja[2], rajah (rä′jä), n. [Hind. rāja, < Skt. rāja, the form in comp. of rājan, a king, as in mahā-rāja, great king; akin to L. rex, king (see rex); < √ rāj, rule: see regent.] In India, a prince of Hindu race ruling a territory, either independently or as a feudatory; a king; a chief: used also as a title of distinction for Hindus in some cases, without reference to sovereignty, as nabob is for Mohammedans. The power of nearly all the rajas is now subordinate to that of British officials resident at their courts. Those who retain some degree of actual sovereignty are commonly distinguished by the title maharaja (great raja).

Rajania (rā-jā′ni-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), an adapted form of Jan-Raja (Plumier, 1703), so called after John Ray (Latinized Raius), 1628–1705, a celebrated English naturalist, founder of a natural system of classification.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants of the family Dioscoreaceæ, the yam family. It is characterized by diœcious bell-shaped or flattened six-lobed flowers, with six stamens and a three-celled ovary, ripening into a flattened broad-winged and one-celled samara. The 6 species are all natives of the West Indies. They are twining vines resembling the yam, and bear alternate leaves, either halberd- or heart-shaped or linear, and small flowers in racemes. Several species are occasionally cultivated under glass. R. cordata, common in woods of the larger West Indies, is there called wild yam and waw-waw.

rajaship, rajahship (rä′jā-ship), n. [< raja[2] + -ship.] The dignity or principality of a raja.

Rajidæ, n. pl. Same as Raiidæ.

Rajput, Rajpoot (raj′pöt), n. [< Hind. rājpūt, a prince, son of a raja, < Skt. rājaputra, a king's son, a prince, < rājan, a king, + putra, son.] A member of a Hindu race, divided into numerous clans, who regard themselves as descendants of the ancient Kshatriya or warrior caste. They are the ruling (though not the most numerous) race of the great region named from them Rajputana, consisting of several different states. Their hereditary profession is that of arms, and no race in India has furnished so large a number of princely families. The Rajputs are not strict adherents of Brahmanism.

rake[1] (rāk), n. [< ME. rake, < AS. raca, racu, ræce = MD. rake, raecke, D. rake, dim. rakel = MLG. rake, LG. rake, a rake, = Sw. raka, an oven-rake, = Dan. rage, a poker; in another form, MD. reke, D. reek = LG. reek = OHG. recho, rehho, MHG. reche, G. rechen, a rake, = Icel. reka, a shovel; from the verb represented by MD. reken, OHG. rechan, rehhan, MHG. rechen, scrape together, = Goth. rikan (pret. rak), collect, heap up (cf. rake[1], v., which depends on the noun).] 1. An implement of wood or iron, or partly of both, with teeth or tines for drawing or scraping things together, evening a surface of loose materials, etc. In its simplest form, for use by hand, it consists of a bar in which the teeth are set, and which is fixed firmly at right angles to a handle. Rakes are made in many ways for a great variety of purposes, and the teeth are inserted either perpendicularly or at a greater or less inclination, according to requirement. Their most prominent uses are in agriculture and gardening, for drawing together hay or grain in the field, leveling beds, etc. For farm-work on a large scale horse-rakes of many forms are used; the above figures represent the so-called sulky-rake.

2. An instrument of similar form and use with a blade instead of teeth, either entire, as a gamblers' or a maltsters' rake, or notched so as to form teeth, as a furriers' rake. See the quotations.

The rake [for malt] . . . is an iron blade, about 30 inches long and perhaps 2 inches broad, fixed at each end by holders to a massive wood head, to which is attached a strong wood shaft, with a cross-head handle.
Ure, Dict., III. 188.

The skin is first carded with a rake, which is the blade of an old shear or piece of a scythe with large teeth notched into its edge. Ure, Dict., IV. 380.

Clam-rake, an instrument used for collecting the sea-clam, Mactra solidissima.—Under-rake, a kind of oyster-rake, used mostly through holes in the ice, with handle 15 to 20 feet long, head 1 to 2 feet wide, and iron teeth 6 to 10 inches long. [Rhode Island.]

★rake[1] (rāk), v.; pret. and pp. raked, ppr. raking. [< ME. raken, scrape, < AS. racian* = MD. raken = MLG. raken = Icel. Sw. raka = Dan. rage, rake; from the noun: see rake[1], n. Cf. MD. reken, OHG. rechan, rehhan, MHG. rechen, scrape together, G. rechen, rake, Goth. rikan (pret. rak), collect, heap up: see rake[1], n.] I. trans. 1. To gather, clear, smooth, or stir with or as if with a rake; treat with a rake, or something that serves the same purpose: as, to rake up hay; to rake a bed in a garden; to rake the fire with a poker or raker.

They rake these coales round in the forme of a cockpit, and in the midst they cast the offenders to broyle to death.
Capt. John Smith, Works, I. 144.

Rake well the cinders, sweep the floor,
And sift the dust behind the door.
Cowper, Epistle to Robert Lloyd.

2. To collect as if by the use of a rake; gather assiduously or laboriously; draw or scrape together, up, or in.

All was rak'd up for me, your thankful brother,
That will dance merrily upon your grave.
Fletcher, Spanish Curate, i. 1.

Who had hence raked some objections against the Christians, for these things which had not authoritie of Scripture. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 68.

Times when chimney-corners had benches in them, where old people sat poking into the ashes of the past, and raking out traditions like live coals.
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xviii.

3. To make minute search in, as if with a rake; look over or through carefully; ransack: as, to rake all history for examples.

The statesman rakes the town to find a plot.
Swift, On Dreams.

4. To pass along with or as if with a scraping motion; impinge lightly upon in moving; hence, to pass over swiftly; scour.

Thy thunders roaring rake the skies,
Thy fatal lightning swiftly flies.
Sandys, Paraphrase of Ps. lxxvii.

Every mast, as it passed,
Seemed to rake the passing clouds.
Longfellow, Sir Humphrey Gilbert.

5. Milit., to fire upon, as a ship, so that the shot will pass lengthwise along the deck; fire in the direction of the length of, as a file of soldiers or a parapet; enfilade.

They made divers shot through her (being but inch board), and so raked her fore and aft as they must needs kill or hurt some of the Indians.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 226.

Raking a ship is the act of cannonading a ship on the stern or head, so as that the balls shall scour the whole length of her decks; which is one of the most dangerous incidents that can happen in a naval action.
Falconer, Marine Dict. (ed. 1778).

6†. To cover with earth raked together; bury. See to rake up, below.

Whanne thi soule is went out, & thi bodi in erthe rakid, Than thi bodi that was rank & Vndeuout, Of alle men is bihatid. Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 89.

To rake hell, to search, as it were, among the damned, implying that the person or thing referred to in the context is so bad or so extreme that an equal could scarcely be found even in hell.

This man I brought to the general, assuring his excellency that if I had raked hell I could not find his match for his skill in mimicking the covenanters.
Swift, Mem. of Capt. Creichton.

To rake up. (a) To cover with material raked or scraped together; bury by overlaying with loose matter: as, to rake up a fire (to cover it with ashes, as in a fireplace).

Here, in the sands,
Thee [a corpse] I'll rake up, the post unsanctified
Of murderous lechers. Shak., Lear, iv. 6. 231.

The Bellowes whence they blowe the fire
Of raging Lust (before) whose wanton flashes
A tender brest rak't-vp in shamefac't ashes.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 2.

(b) To draw from oblivion or obscurity, as something forgotten or abandoned; bring to renewed attention; resuscitate; revive: used in a more or less opprobrious sense: as, to rake up a forgotten quarrel.

Nobody thinks any more of the late King than if he had been dead fifty years, unless it be to abuse him and to rake up all his vices and misdeeds.
Greville, Memoirs, July 16, 1830.

To rake up old claims based on a forgotten state of things, after treaty or long use had buried them, is profligate.
Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, App. iii., p. 438.

II. intrans. 1. To use a rake; work with a rake, especially in drawing together hay or grain.—2. To make search with or as if with a rake; seek diligently for something; pry; peer here and there.

Those who take pleasure to be all thir life time rakeing in the Foundations of Old Abbies and Cathedrals.
Milton, Hist. Eng., iv.

But what pleasure is it to rake into the sores or to reprove the Vices of a degenerate age?
Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. iii.

rake[2]† (rāk), n. [< ME. rake (also raike), < AS. racu, a path (eá-racu, a river-path), from the root of rack[1]: see rack[5]. Cf. rake[2], v.] A course, way, road, or path.

Rydes one a rawndoune, and his rayke holdes.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 2986.

Out of the rake of riztwysnes renne suld he nevire.
King Alisaunder, p. 115.

rake[2] (rāk), v. i.; pret. and pp. raked, ppr. raking. [Early mod. E. (Sc.) also raik; < ME. raken, < AS. racian, run, take a course, = Sw. raka, run hastily; mixed with ME. raiken, rayken, reyken, < Icel. reika, wander: see rake[2], n.] 1. To take a course; move; go; proceed. [Obsolete or prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Then Paris aprochyt, the Percians hym with:
Radli on the right syde rakit he furth,
And bounet into batell with a brym will.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 6904.

Now pass we to the bold beggar
That raked o'er the hill.
Robin Hood and the Beggar (Child's Ballads, V. 196).

2. In hunting: (a) Of a hawk, to range wildly; fly wide of the game.

Their talk was all of training, terms of art,
Diet and seeling, jesses, leash and lure.
"She is too noble," he said, "to check at pies, Nor will she rake; there is no baseness in her."
Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

(b) Of a dog, to follow a wrong method in hunting. See the quotation.

All young dogs are apt to rake: that is, to hunt with their noses close to the ground, following their birds by the track rather than by the wind.
Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 466.

To rake about, to gad or wander about. [Scotch.]

rake[3] (rāk), v.; pret. and pp. raked, ppr. raking. [< OSw. raka, project, reach (raka fram, reach over, project), = Dan. rage, project, protrude, jut out; allied to AS. reccan, stretch: see rack[1], retch[1].] I. intrans. To incline from the perpendicular or the horizontal, as the mast, stem, or stern of a ship, the rafters of a roof, the end of a tool, etc. See the noun.

The stern, when viewed in the sheer plan, rakes aft, the bounding line being straight, and making an obtuse angle with the line forming the boundary of the buttock.
Thearle, Naval Arch., § 107.

II. trans. To give a rake to; cause to incline or slope. [Rare.]

Every face in it [the theater] commanding the stage, and the whole so admirably raked and turned to that centre that a hand can scarcely move in the great assemblage without the movement being seen from thence.
Dickens, Uncommercial Traveller, Journey iii.

rake[3] (rāk), n. [< rake[3], v.] 1. Inclination or slope away from a perpendicular or a horizontal line. The rake of a ship's mast is its inclination backward, or rarely (in some peculiar rigs) forward; that of its stem or its stern (the fore rake and the rake aft of the ship) is the slope inward from the upper works to the keel; also called hang. (See cut under patamar.) The rake of a roof is its pitch or slope from the ridge to the eaves. The rake of a saw-tooth is the angle of inclination which a straight line drawn through the middle of the base of the tooth and its point forms with a radius also drawn through the middle of the base of the tooth; of a cutting-tool, the slope backward and downward from the edge on either side or both sides. Rake in a grinding-mill is a sloping or want of balance of the runner, producing undue pressure at one edge.

2. In coal-mining, a series of thin layers of ironstone lying so near each other that they can all be worked together. [Derbyshire, Eng.]

rake[4] (rāk), n. [Abbr. of rakehell, ult. of rakel.] An idle, dissolute person; one who goes about in search of vicious pleasure; a libertine; an idle person of fashion.

We have now and then rakes in the habit of Roman senators, and grave politicians in the dress of rakes.
Steele, Spectator, No. 14.

I am in a fair Way to be easy, were it not for a Club of Female Rakes who, under pretence of taking their innocent rambles, forsooth, and diverting the Spleen, seldom fail to plague me twice or thrice a day to Cheapen Tea, or buy a Skreen. . . . These Rakes are your idle Ladies of Fashion, who, having nothing to do, employ themselves in tumbling over my Ware. Steele, Spectator, No. 336.

rake[4] (rāk), v. i.; pret. and pp. raked, ppr. raking. [< rake[4], n.] To play the part of a rake; lead a dissolute, debauched life; practise lewdness.

'Tis his own fault, that will rake and drink when he is but just crawled out of his grave.
Swift, Journal to Stella, xx.

Women hid their necks, and veil'd their faces,
Nor romp'd, nor rak'd, nor star'd at public places.
Shenstone, Epil. to Dodsley's Cleone.

rake-dredge (rāk'drej), n. A combined rake and dredge used for collecting specimens in natural history. It is a heavy A-shaped iron frame, to the arms of which bars of iron armed with long, thin, sharp teeth, arranged like those of a rake, are bolted back to back. A rectangular frame of round iron, supporting a deep and fine dredge-net, is placed behind the rake, to receive and retain the animals raked from the mud or sand.

rakee, n. See raki.

rake-head (rāk'hed), n. In her., a bearing representing the head of a rake, or, more usually, four or five hooks or curved teeth inserted in a short rod.

rakehell (rāk'hel), a. and n. [A corruption of rakel, simulating rake[1], v., + obj. hell, as if one so bad as to be found only by raking hell, or one so reckless as to rake hell (in double allusion to the "harrowing of hell": see harrow[2] and harrow[1]): see rakel, and cf. to rake hell, under rake[1], v.] I. a. Dissolute; base; profligate.

And farre away, amid their rakehell banda,
They spide a Lady left all succourlesse.
Spenser, F. Q., V. xi. 44.

II. n. An abandoned fellow; a wicked wretch; especially, a dissolute fellow; a rake.

I thought it good, necessary, and my bounden duty to acquaint your goodness with the abominable, wicked, and detestable behaviour of all these rowsey, ragged rabblement of rake-hells, that under the pretence of great misery, diseases, and other innumerable calamities, which they feign through great hypocrisy, do win and gain great alms in all places where they wily wander, to the utter deluding of the good givers.
Harman, Caveat for Cursetors, p. ii.

A sort of lewd rake-hells, that care neither for God nor the devil. B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iv. 1.

A rakehell of the town, whose character is set off with no other accomplishment but excessive prodigality, profaneness, intemperance, and lust, is rewarded with a lady of great fortune to repair his own, which his vices had almost ruined. Swift, Against Abolishing Christianity.

rakehellonian† (rāk-he-lō'ni-an), n. [< rakehell + -onian, as in Babylonian, etc.] A wild, dissolute fellow; a rakehell. [Rare.]

I have been a man of the town, or rather a man of wit, and have been confess'd a beau, and admitted into the family of the rakehellonians.
Tom Brown, Works, II. 313. (Davies.)

rakehelly (rāk'hel-i), a. [< rakehell + -y[1]. Cf. rakely.] Like or characteristic of a rakehell.

Rallidæ (ral'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Rallus + -idæ.] A family of paludicole grallatorial precocial birds, typified by the genus Rallus, and divided into Rallinæ, Gallinulinæ, and Fulicinæ, or rails, gallinules, and coots, to which some add Ocydrominæ and Himantornithinæ; the rails and their allies. There are upward of 150 species, found in nearly all parts of the world, in swamps and marshes. See cuts under coot, gallinule, Porzana, and Rallus.

rallier[1] (ral'i-ėr), n. [< rally[1] + -er[1].] One who rallies or reassembles; one who reunites, as disordered or scattered forces.

rallier[2] (ral'i-ėr), n. [< rally[2] + -er[1].] One who rallies or banters. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

ralliform (ral'i-fôrm), a. [< NL. ralliformis, < Rallus, a rail, + L. forma, form.] Having the structure of or an affinity with the rails; ralline in a broad sense; of or pertaining to the Ralliformes.

Ralliformes (ral-i-fôr'mēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of ralliformis: see ralliform.] A superfamily of paludicole precocial grallatorial birds, represented by the family Rallidæ in a broad sense, containing the rails and their allies, as distinguished from the Gruiformes, or related birds of the crane type.

Rallinæ (ra-lī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Rallus + -inæ.] The leading subfamily of Rallidæ, including the genus Rallus and related genera; the rails. The species are strictly paludicole; the body is greatly compressed; the form tapers in front, and is thick-set behind, with a short tipped-up tail; the wings are short and rounded; the tail has twelve feathers; the thighs are very muscular, and the flank-feathers are notably colored; the tibiæ are naked below; the tarsi are scutellate in front; and the toes are long, cleft to the base, and not lobed or obviously margined. Besides Rallus, the leading genera are Porzana and Crex. There are about 60 species, found in most countries.

ralline (ral'in), a. [NL., < Rallus + -ine[1].] Pertaining or related to the genus Rallus or family Rallidæ; resembling a rail; ralliform in a narrow sense.

rallum (ral'um), n.; pl. ralla (-ä). [L., < radere, scrape, scratch: see rase[1], raze[1].] An implement used as a scraper by husbandmen among the Romans, consisting of a straight handle and a triangular blade.—Rallum-shaped, growing wider toward the end and terminating squarely, as the blade of a stylus.

Rallus (ral'us), n. [NL., < F. râle, OF. rasle, a rail: see rail[4].] The leading genus of Rallinæ, containing the true rails, water-rails, or marshhens, having the bill longer than the head, slender, compressed, and decurved, with long nasal groove and linear subbasal nostrils, and the coloration plain below, but with conspicuously ★banded flanks. See rail[4].

rally[1] (ral'i), v.; pret. and pp. rallied, ppr. rallying. [Early mod. E. rallie, < OF. rallier, ralier, F. rallier, rally, < re-, again, + alier, allier, bind, ally: see ally[1], and cf. rely[1] and rely[2].] I. trans. 1. To bring together or into order again by urgent effort; urge or bring to reunion for joint action; hence, to draw or call together in general for a common purpose: as, to rally a disorganized army; to rally voters to the polls.

There 's no help now;
The army 's scatter'd all, through discontent,
Not to be rallied up in haste to help this. Fletcher, Loyal Subject, iii. 1.

2. To call up or together, unite, draw, gather up, concentrate, etc., energetically.

Prompts them to rally all their sophistry. Decay of Christian Piety.

Grasping his foe in mortal agony, he rallied his strength for a final blow. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 7.

Philip rallied himself, and tried to speak up to the old standard of respectability. Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xxxiv.

II. intrans. 1. To come together or into order again with haste or ardor; reunite energetically; hence, to gather or become conjoined for a common end; cohere for aid or support.

And then we rally'd on the hills.
Up and War Them A', Willie (Child's Ballads, VII. 266).

They rallied round their flags, and renewed the assault.
The Century, XXIX. 297.

2. To come into renewed energy or action; acquire new or renewed strength or vigor; undergo restoration or recovery, either partial or complete: as, the market rallied from its depression; the patient rallied about midnight.

Innumerable parts of matter chanced then to rally together and to form themselves into this new world.
Tillotson.

Catholicism had rallied, and had driven back Protestantism even to the German Ocean.
Macaulay, Von Ranke's Hist. Popes.

★rally[1] (ral'i), n.; pl. rallies (-iz). [< rally[1], v.] 1. A rapid or ardent reunion for effort of any kind; a renewal of energy in joint action; a quick recovery from disorder or dispersion, as of a body of troops or other persons.—2. Theat., specifically, the general scramble or chase of all the players in a pantomime; a mêlée of pantomimists, as at the end of a transformation scene.

The last scene of all, which in modern pantomime follows upon the shadowy chase of the characters called the rally. Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 216.

3. In lawn-tennis, the return of the ball over the net from one side to the other for a number of times consecutively.—4. A quick recovery from a state of depression or exhaustion; renewal of energy or of vigorous action; return to or toward the prior or normal condition, as in disease, trade, active exertion of any kind, etc.: as, a rally in the course of a disease; a rally in prices.

The two stand to one another like men; rally follows rally in quick succession, each fighting as if he thought to finish the whole thing out of hand.
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, ii. 5.

rally[2] (ral'i), v.; pret. and pp. rallied, ppr. rallying. [< F. railler, rail: see rail[5].] I. trans. To attack with raillery; treat with jocose, satirical, or sarcastic pleasantry; make merry with in regard to something; poke fun at; quiz.

Strephon had long confess'd his amorous pain,
Which gay Corinna rallied with disdain.
Gay, The Fan, i. 40.

Snake has just been rallying me on our mutual attachment. Sheridan, School for Scandal, i. 1.

=Syn. Banter, etc. (see banter), joke, quiz, tease.

II. intrans. To use pleasantry or satirical merriment.

Juvenal has railed more wittily than Horace has rallied.
Dryden, Orig. and Prog. of Satire.

This gentleman rallies the best of any man I know; for he forms his ridicule upon a circumstance which you are in your heart not unwilling to grant him: to wit, that you are guilty of an excess in something which is in itself laudable. Steele, Spectator, No. 422.

rally[2] (ral'i), n. [< rally[2], v.] An exercise of good humor or satirical merriment. [Rare.]

rallyingly (ral'i-ing-li), adv. In a rallying, bantering, or quizzical manner. [Rare.]

ram[1] (ram), n. [< ME. ram, ramme, rom, < AS. ram, ramm, rom; = D. ram = MLG. LG. ram = OHG. ram, rammo, MHG. ram, G. ramm, a ram, male sheep. Hence ram[2]. Cf. ram[3].] The male of the sheep, Ovis aries, and other ovine quadrupeds; a tup. See cuts under Ovis and quadricornous.—The Ram, Aries, one of the signs and ★constellations of the zodiac. See Aries.

ram[2] (ram), n. [< ME. ram, ramme, < AS. ram, ramm = D. ram, m., = MHG. G. ramme, f., a battering-ram; orig. a particular use of ram[1], in allusion to the way a ram uses his head in fighting.] 1. An instrument for battering, crushing, butting, or driving by impact. Specifically—(a) Same as battering-ram.

Bring up your rams,
And with their armèd heads make the fort totter.
Fletcher, Bonduca, iv. 4.

(b) A solid pointed projection or beak jutting from the bow of a war-vessel, used both in ancient and in recent times for crushing in an enemy's vessel by being driven against it. See def. 2, and cut under embolon. (c) The heavy weight of a pile-driving machine, which falls upon the head of the pile: same as monkey, 3. (d) The piston in the large cylinder of a hydraulic press. (e) A hooped spar used in ship-building for moving timbers by a jolting blow on the end. (f) In metal-working, a steam-hammer used in forming a bloom.

2. A heavy metallic beak or spur projecting forward under water from the stem of a war-vessel, intended to destroy an enemy's ship by penetrating it in collision; hence, by extension, a steamship of war especially designed to use the ram as its principal offensive weapon and given great manœuvering powers for this purpose. The beak is often so far independent of the vital structure of the ship that, in the event of a serious collision, it may be carried away without essential injury to the ship to which it belongs. See cuts under beak.

With the introduction of sail propulsion ramming was nearly given over, but when steam came to the front it reappeared in a form which soon reached its highest development. The ram, however, has never accomplished much except under special conditions, and it is now regarded as practically obsolete.
New Inter. Cyclo., XVI. 689.

Hydraulic ram. See hydraulic.

ram[2] (ram), v.; pret. and pp. rammed, ppr. ramming. [< ME. rammen, ram, ram; cf. D. rammen = MLG. rammen, ram, batter, = G. rammen, ram, bore or drive in (> Dan. ramme, hit, strike, ram, drive); from the noun: see ram[1], n.] I. trans. 1. To strike with a ram; drive a ram or similar object against; batter: as, the two vessels tried to ram each other.—2. To force in; drive down or together: as, to ram down a cartridge; to ram a charge; to ram piles into the earth.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 143.

3. To fill or compact by pounding or driving.

Lady Len. No man shall ever come within my gates.
Men. Fos. Wilt thou ram up thy porch-hold?
Marston and Barksted, Insatiate Countess, i.

A Ditch . . . was filled with some sound materials, and ramm'd to make the foundation solid.
Arbuthnot, Ancient Coins, p. 76.

4. To stuff as if with a ram; cram.

By the Lord, a buck-basket! rammed me in with foul shirts and smocks, socks, foul stockings, greasy napkins.
Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 5. 90.

They ramme in great piles of woode, which they lay very deep. Coryat, Crudities, I. 206.

Do not bring your Æsop, your politician, unless you can ram up his mouth with cloves.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, iii. 1.

II. intrans. To beat or pound anything, in any of the transitive senses of ram.

So was it impossible that the wals of Iericho should fall downe, being neither vndermined nor yet rammed at with engines. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 134.

Finding that he could do no good by ramming with logs of timber, he set one of the gates on fire.
Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII.

With all the watchfulness and all the skill in the world, it would be futile to attempt to pass through the real ice-pack without a ship built for ramming.
Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greely, p. 160.

ram[3] (ram), a. [< Icel. ramr, strong (ramliga, strongly), = Sw. ram, strong, perfect, mere (en ram bonde, 'a perfect boor'), = Dan. ram, sharp, acrid, rank, mere (ram jydsk, 'pure Jutish').] 1. Strong; as a prefix, very: used as a prefix in ramshackle, rambustious, etc.—2. Strong-scented; stinking: as, ram as a fox. Latham.

Ramadan, Ramadhan (ram-ạ-dän'), n. [Also Ramazan, Ramadzan, and Rhamazan; = F. ramazan, ramadan = Sp. ramadán = Pg. ramadan, remedão = Turk. Pers. ramazān, < Ar. ramadān, the name of the 9th month of the Moslem year, < ramed (ramad), be heated or hot.] The ninth month of the Mohammedan year, and the period of the annual thirty days' fast or Mohammedan Lent, rigidly observed daily from dawn until sunset, when all restrictions are removed. The lunar reckoning of the Mohammedan calendar brings its recurrence about eleven days earlier each year, so that it passes through all the seasons successively in a cycle of about thirty-three years; but it is supposed that when it was named it was regularly one of the hot months, through lunisolar reckoning. The close of the fast is followed by the three days' feast called the Lesser Bairam.

ramage[1]† (ram'ăj), a. and n. [I. a. < ME. ramage, < OF. ramage, of or belonging to branches, wild, rude, < LL. ramaticus*, of branches, < ramus, a branch: see ramus. II. n. < OF. ramage, branches, branching, song of birds on the branches, etc., < LL. ramaticum*, neut. of ramaticus*, of branches: see I.] I. a. 1. Having left the nest and begun to sit upon the branches: said of birds.

My first Entrance upon this Rambling kind of Life.
Dampier, Voyages, II., Pref.

2. To take a wavering or wandering course; proceed with irregular turns, windings, or transitions; show a lack of definite direction or arrangement: as, a rambling path or house;

a rambling discourse; the vine rambles every way; he rambled on in his incoherent speech.

But wisdom does not lie in the rambling imaginations of men's minds. Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. ii.

O'er his ample sides the rambling sprays Luxuriant shoot. Thomson, Spring, l. 794.

Our home is a rambling old place, on the outskirts of a country town. The Century, XL. 278.

3. To reel; stagger. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

=Syn. 1. Ramble, Stroll, Saunter, Rove, Roam, Wander, Range, Stray. Ramble, by derivation, also stroll and saunter, and stray when used in this sense, express a less extended course than the others. To ramble or stroll is to go about, as fancy leads, for the pleasure of being abroad. To saunter is to go along idly, and therefore slowly. One may saunter or stroll, stray or wander, along one street as far as it goes. To ramble, rove, or roam is to pursue a course that is not very straight. One may rove, roam, or wander with some briskness or for some object, as in search of a lost child. One may wander about or stray about because he has lost his way. The wild beast ranges, roves, or roams in search of prey. Roam expresses most of definite purpose: as, to roam over Europe.

ramble (ram'bl), n. [< ramble, v.] 1. A roving or wandering movement; a going or turning about irregularly or indefinitely; especially, a leisurely or sauntering walk in varying directions.

Coming home after a short Christmas ramble, I found a letter upon my table. Swift.

In the middle of a brook, whose silver ramble
Down twenty little falls, through reeds and bramble,
Tracing along, it brought me to a cave.
Keats, Endymion, i.

On returning from our ramble, we passed the house of the Governor. B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 37.

2. A place to ramble in; a mazy walk or tract. —3. In coal-mining, thin shaly beds of stone, taken down with the coal, above which a good roof may be met with. Gresley.

rambler (ram'blėr), n. [< ramble, v., + -er[1].] One who rambles; a rover; a wanderer.

There is a pair of Stocks by every Watch house, to secure night ramblers in. Dampier, Voyages, II. i. 77.

rambling (ram'bling), n. [Verbal n. of ramble, v.] 1. The act of wandering about, or from place to place.

Rambling makes little alteration in the mind, unless proper care be taken to improve it by the observations that are made.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 277.

2. A roving excursion or course; an indefinite or whimsical turning back and forth.

Thy money she will waste
In the vain ramblings of a vulgar taste.
Crabbe, Works, I. 73.

And oft in ramblings on the wold . . .
I saw the village lights below.
Tennyson, Miller's Daughter.

ramicorneous (rā-mi-kôr'nē-us), a. [< ramicorn + -eous.] Of or pertaining to the ramicorn.

Ramicornes (rā-mi-kôr'nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of ramicornis: see ramicorn.] In entom., a group of hemipterous insects, having ramified antennæ. See ramose.

ramie (ram'ē), n. [Malay rāmī.] A plant, the so-called China grass, Bœhmeria nivea, or its fiber. The plant is a perennial shrub with herbaceous shoots, native in the Malay islands, China, and Japan. It has long been cultivated in parts of the East Indies to supply fiber for fish-nets and cloths, and in China and Japan textiles of great beauty are made from this material. (See grass-cloth.) In length, thickness, and woodiness the stems most nearly resemble hemp. The fiber is unsurpassed in strength, is in an exceptional degree unaffected by moisture, in fineness rivals flax, and has a silky luster shared only by jute. The plant can be grown in any moderate climate—in the southern United States and as far north as New Jersey, as demonstrated by experiment. Also called cambric-grass, silk-grass, and ramie-hemp; in India, rhea. See cut under Bœhmeria.

ramie-plant (ram'ē-plant), n. See ramie.

ramification (ram″i-fi-kā'shọn), n. [= F. ramification = Sp. ramificación = Pg. ramificação = It. ramificazione, < ML. ramificatio(n-)*, < ramificare, ramify: see ramify.] 1. The act or process of ramifying, or the state of being ramified; a branching out; division into branches, or into divergent lines, courses, or parts, as of trees or plants, blood-vessels, a mountain-chain, a topic or subject, etc. —2. The manner or result of ramifying or branching; that which is ramified or divided into branches; a set of branches: as, the ramification of a coral; the ramifications of an artery or a nerve; the ramifications of the capillaries, or of nerves in an insect's wing. See cuts under Dendrocœla and embryo.

Infinite vascular ramifications, . . . revealed only by the aid of the highest powers of the microscope.
Is. Taylor.

3. In bot., the branching, or the manner of branching, of stems and roots. —4. One of the branches or divergent lines or parts into which anything is divided; a division or subdivision springing or derived from a main stem or source: as, the ramifications of a conspiracy; to pursue a subject in all its ramifications.

When the radical idea branches out into parallel ramifications, how can a consecutive series be formed of senses in their nature collateral? Johnson, Eng. Dict., Pref.

5. The production of figures resembling branches. —Point of ramification, in the integral calculus, a point on the plane of complex quantity where two or more values of the function become equal. Also called critical point.

ramiflorous (rā-mi-flō'rus), a. [< L. ramus, branch, + flos (flor-), flower.] Flowering on the branches. Gray.

ramiform (rā'mi-fôrm), a. [= F. ramiforme, < L. ramus, a branch, + forma, form.] In bot. and zoöl., resembling a branch.

ramify (ram'i-fī), v.; pret. and pp. ramified, ppr. ramifying. [< F. ramifier = Pr. Sp. Pg. ramificar = It. ramificare, < ML. ramificare* (in pp. ramificatus), branch, ramify, < L. ramus, a branch (see ramus), + -ficare, < facere, make.] I. intrans. 1. To form branches; shoot into branches, as the stem of a plant, or anything analogous to it; branch out.

When they [asparagus-plants] are older, and begin to ramify, they lose this quality. Arbuthnot, Aliments, p. 61.

The "test" has a single round orifice, from which, when the animal is in a state of activity, the sarcodic substance streams forth, speedily giving off ramifying extensions.
W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 397.

2. To diverge in various ways or to different points; stretch out in different lines or courses; radiate.

The establishments of our large carriers ramify throughout the whole kingdom. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 441.

II. trans. To divide into branches or parts; extend in different lines or directions.

Whoever considers the few radical positions which the Scriptures afforded him will wonder by what energetic operations he expanded them to such an extent, and ramified them to so much variety. Johnson, Milton.

It is also infinitely ramified, diversified, extending everywhere, and touching everything.
D. Webster, Speech, March 18, 1834.

Ramilie (ram'i-lē), n. [< Ramillies: see def.] A name given to various articles or modes of dress, in commemoration of Marlborough's victory at Ramillies in Belgium over the French under Villeroi, in 1706: chiefly used attributively. The Ramilie hat was a form of cocked hat worn in the time of George I. Its peculiarity consisted in the adjustment of the hat-brim—apparently the one in which the three cocks are nearly equal in length and similar in arrangement. The Ramilie wig, worn as late as the time of George III., had a long, gradually diminishing plait, called the Ramilie plait or tail, with a very large bow at the top and a smaller one at the bottom.

A peculiar-shaped hat was known as the "Ramilie cock." N. and Q., 6th ser., XII. 35.

While in this country, the natural hair tied in a pigtail and powdered passed for as good as the Ramilie wig and Ramilie tail. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 290.

ramiparous (rā-mip′a-rus), a. [< L. ramus, a branch, + parere, produce.] Producing branches.

ramish†, a. [A corruption of ramage[1].] Same as ramage[1].

The plaintiff had declared for a ramish hawk, which is a hawk living inter ramos (amongst the boughs), and by consequence feræ naturæ. Nelson, Laws Conc. Game, p. 151. (Encyc. Dict.)

Ramism (rā′mizm), n. [< Ramus (see def.) + -ism.] The logical doctrine of Petrus Ramus, or Pierre de la Ramée (born in Picardy, 1515; massacred on St. Bartholomew's day, 1572). The doctrine was that of Aristotle, with the omission of the more difficult and metaphysical parts, and with a few additions drawn from rhetoric and from Platonic sources (such as the doctrine of dichotomy). It was characterized by simplicity and good sense, and was set forth with some literary skill. It attracted considerable attention, owing to the unbounded hostility to Aristotle professed by Ramus, and was taught for many years in the Scottish universities and at Cambridge. John Milton wrote a Ramist logic.

In England, Cambridge alone, always disposed to reject the authority of Aristotle, and generally more open to new ideas than the sister university, was a stronghold of Ramism. R. Adamson, Encyc. Brit., XIV. 803.

Ramist (rā′mist), n. and a. [< F. ramiste, a Ramist, pertaining to Ramus, < Ramus (see Ramism).] I. n. A follower of Peter Ramus. See Ramism. The main position of Ramus was that "everything that Aristotle taught was false," but there was nothing original in his writings. He introduced into logic the dilemma, which had always been taught as a part of rhetoric, to which he greatly inclined.

II. a. Pertaining to Ramus or Ramism; characterized by or characteristic of Ramism.—Ramist consonants (French consonnes ramistes), the letters j and v: so called by French writers, because Ramus was the first, in his grammatical writings, to distinguish them as consonants from the vowels i and u.

ram-line (ram′līn), n. [< ram (?) (see rammed) + line[2].] 1. In ship-building, a small rope or line sometimes used for setting the beams fair, assisting in forming the sheer of the ship, or for similar purposes.—2. In spar-making, a line used to make a straight middle line on a spar.

It. riparo (= Pg. reparo), a defense, < riparare, defend, = Pg. reparar, repair, shelter: see repair[1]. Cf. parapet, which contains the same ult. verb.] 1. In fort., an elevation or mound of earth round a place, capable of resisting cannon-shot, and having the parapet raised upon it; a protecting enceinte; also, this elevation together with the parapet. The rampart is built of the earth taken out of the ditch, but the lower part of the outer slope is usually constructed of masonry. The top of the rampart behind the parapet should have sufficient width for the free passage of troops, guns, etc. See cut under parapet.

Thrice . . . did he set up his banner upon the rampier of the enemy. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

When bands
Of pioneers, with spade and pickaxe arm'd, Forerun the royal camp, to trench a field,
Or cast a rampart. Milton, P. L., i. 678.

The term rampart, though strictly meaning the mound on which the parapet stands, generally includes the parapet itself.
Brande and Cox, Dict. of Sci., Lit., and Art, III. 205.

Hence — 2. Something that serves as a bulwark or defense; an obstruction against approach or intrusion; a protecting inclosure.

What rampire can my human frailty raise ram-riding (ram′rī″ding), n. See the quotation.

One summer evening, when the scandalised townsmen and their wedded wives assembled, and marched down to the cottage with intent to lead the woman in a Ram-riding, i. e. in a shameful penitential procession through the streets, the sight of Kit playing in the garden, and his look of innocent delight as he ran in to call his mother out, took the courage out of them.
The Speaker, April 19, 1890, I. 427.

ramrod (ram′rod), n. [< ram[2] + rod.] A rod for ramming down the charge of a gun, pistol, or other firearm, especially for small hand-fire-arms. (Compare rammer.) Now that most small-arms load at the breech, ramrods are much less used than formerly. The ordinary ramrod for shot-guns, rifles, and the like was an unjointed wooden or iron rod, enlarged at the head or there fitted with a metal cap, and furnished at the other end with a screw or wormer for extracting a charge; when not in use it was carried in thimbles on the under side of the barrel.

ramrod-bayonet (ram′rod-bā″o-net), n. A steel rod one end of which is fitted for cleaning the bore of a rifle, while the other is pointed to serve as a bayonet: when intended for use as a weapon, the bayonet end is drawn a certain distance beyond the muzzle, and is held by a catch.

Ranæ (rā′nē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. rana, frog: see Rana[1].] The salient batrachians as an order of reptiles. Wagler, 1830.

Ranales (rā-nā′lēz), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1833), < Ran(unculus), the type of the cohort.] A large order of dicotyledonous archichlamydeous plants, of which Ranunculaceæ is the typical family. As founded by Lindley in his "Nixus Plantarum" (1833) and called a cohort, and maintained as an alliance in his "Vegetable Kingdom," it included only choripetalous families, and in the system of Bentham and Hooker this limitation was adhered to with slight modifications. In Engler's system the choripetalous families with the exception of the Dilleniaceæ are retained (Ranunculaceæ, Nymphæaceæ, Berberidaceæ, Menispermaceæ, Magnoliaceæ, Calycanthaceæ, Anonaceæ, etc.), and the following apetalous families are added: Ceratophyllaceæ, Lactoridaceæ, Myristicaceæ, Gomortegaceæ, Monimiaceæ, Lauraceæ, Hernandiaceæ.

ranarium (rā-nā′ri-um), n.; pl. ranaria (-ä). [NL., < L. rana, frog (see Rana[1]), + -arium.] A collection of live frogs; a place where frogs are kept alive, to study their transformations, for vivisection in physiological experiments, etc.

The institute also contains a large room full of rabbits and guinea-pigs, for which a little lawn is provided in summer. It also possesses a ranarium, in which are 700 frogs, divided into thirty-one departments, to prevent the spread of the frog disease.
Lancet, No. 3426, p. 862.

Ranatra (ran'ạ-trạ), n. [NL.] 1. A Fabrician (1794) genus of hemipterous insects of the family Nepidæ. In these curious water-bugs the body is extremely long and cylindric, the short acute rostrum is directed forward, there is a long anal respiratory tube, and the fore legs are raptorial. The species are aquatic and carnivorous. They are found in freshwater ponds, and feed on fish-eggs, fry, and other water-bugs. R. linearis of Europe is an example; R. fusca is common in North America, where it is called needle-bug.

Needle-bug (Ranatra fusca), two thirds natural size.

2. [l. c.] A bug of this genus; a needle-bug.

rance[1] (rans), n. [< OF. ranche, a stick, wooden pin, F. ranche, a round (of a ladder), rack, prop, or brace; cf. A random arrow from the brain.
Tennyson, Two Voices.

You feel that the whole of him [Dryden] was better than any random specimen, though of his best, seems to prove.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 8.

Random choice, the selection of objects, subject to the condition that they shall belong to a given class or collection, but not voluntarily subject to any other condition. The assumption is that objects so selected will in the long run occur as objects of the same kind occur in general experience. This assumption is natural, it leads to no difficulty, and no serious doubt has ever been thrown upon it. It is the fundamental postulate of the theory of probability. See probability.—Random courses, in masonry and paving, courses of stones in horizontal beds, the stones being of unequal thickness, but exactly fitted together.—Random line. (a) In local probability, an infinite straight line supposed to be chosen in such a manner that the infinitesimal probability of its cutting any limited straight line is proportional to the length of the latter. (b) In United States public land-surveying, a trial line on which temporary mile and half-mile stakes are set, for the purpose of getting the data for rerunning the same line and setting permanent stakes at the corners.—Random point, in local probability, a point supposed to be so chosen that the infinitesimal probability of its lying within any closed surface is proportional to the solid contents of that surface.—Random-range ashler, random-tooled ashler. See ashler, 3.—Random shot, a shot not intentionally directed to any point; also, a shot with the muzzle of the gun elevated above the horizontal line.—Random stonework, in masonry, a construction formed of squared stones varying in thickness and not laid in courses. See cut under ashler.—Random tooling, the act of bringing the face of a stone to a nearly smooth surface by hewing it over with a broad-pointed chisel, which produces a series of minute waves at right angles to its path. It is called droving in Scotland.—Random work, random stonework.—Random yarn, in dyeing, yarn dipped into a bath of water with a layer of color at the top, so as to produce a clouded effect; clouded yarn.

On the large scale the random yarns are coloured in machines. W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico-Printing, p. 102.

II. n. Something done or produced without definite method, or with irregular or haphazard effect. (a) In masonry, one of a number of dressed stones of irregular or unmatched sizes. See random stonework, under I.

When I briefly speak of the Greek school of art with reference to questions of delineation, I mean the entire range of the schools from Homer's days to our own.
Ruskin, Aratra Pentelici, p. 157.

In the range of historical geography, the most curious feature is the way in which certain political names have kept on an abiding life in this region, though with singular changes of meaning. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 4.

4. Extent of operating force or activity; scope or compass of efficient action; space or distance over or through which energy can be exerted; limit of effect or of capability; extent of reach: as, the range of a gun or a shot; the range of a thermometer or a barometer (the extent of its variation in any period, or of its capacity for marking degrees of change); the range of a singer or of a musical instrument. Range in shooting is the horizontal distance to which a projectile is or may be thrown by a gun or other arm under existing conditions: distinguished from trajectory, or the curvilinear distance traversed by the projectile when the arm is elevated out of a horizontal line. The effective range depends upon the amount or the absence of elevation and the consequent trajectory. (Compare point-blank.) To get the range of a point to be fired at is to ascertain, either by calculation or by experiment, or by both, the degree of elevation for the muzzle of the piece necessary to bring the shot to bear upon it.

Far as creation's ample range extends,
The scale of sensual, mental powers ascends.
Pope, Essay on Man, i. 207.

Her warbling voice, a lyre of widest range,
Struck by all passion, did fall down and glance
From tone to tone. Tennyson, Fair Women.

No obstacle was encountered until the gunboats and transports were within range of the fort.
U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 439.

The proposal [advocating cremation] was not to be regarded as coming within the range of a practical policy.
Nineteenth Century, XXIII. 2.

5. Unobstructed distance or interval from one point or object to another; length of course for free direct ranging through the air, as of a missile or of sight; a right line of aim or of observation, absolute or relative: as, the range is too great for effective firing; the range of vision.—6. The act of ranging; a wandering or roving; movement from point to point in space.

He may take a range all the world over. South.

7. An area or course of ranging, either in space or in time; an expanse for movement or existence; the region, sphere, or space over which any being or thing ranges or is distributed: as, the range of an animal or a plant within geographical limits or during geological time, or of a marine animal in depth; the range of Gothic architecture; the range of a man's influence.

The free bison's amplitude of range.
Whittier, The Panorama.

Specifically — (a) A tract or district of land within which domestic animals in large numbers range for subsistence; an extensive grazing-ground: used on the great plains of the United States for a tract commonly of many square miles, occupied by one or by different proprietors, and distinctively called a cattle-, stock-, or sheep-range. The animals on a range are usually left to take care of themselves during the whole year without shelter, excepting when periodically gathered in a "round-up" for counting and selection, and for branding when the herds of several proprietors run together. In severe winters many are lost by such exposure.

Cowboys from neighboring ranches will ride over, looking for lost horses, or seeing if their cattle have strayed off the range. T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 500.

(b) A course for shooting at marks or targets; a space of ground appropriated or laid out for practice in the use of firearms: distinctively called a rifle-range or shooting-range.

8. A fire-grate.

He was bid at his first coming to take off the range, and let down the cinders. Sir R. L'Estrange. (Latham.)

9. A cooking-stove built into a fireplace, or sometimes portable but of a similar shape, having a row or rows of openings on the top for carrying on several operations at once. Fixed ranges usually have two ovens, either on each side of the fire-chamber or above it at the back, and in houses supplied with running water a hot-water reservoir or permanent boiler. The origin of the modern cooking-range may be sought in the furnaces of masonry of the ancient Romans, arranged to receive cooking-utensils on the top. Throughout the middle ages only open-chimney fires were used, until in France, in the course of the fourteenth century, built furnaces with openings above for pots began to be added in great kitchens, for convenience in preparing the soups and sauces then in greater favor than before. The range in the modern sense, involving the application of heat conducted by and reflected from iron plates, was first advanced and practically improved by Count Rumford.

It [the kitchen] was a vaut ybuilt for great dispence,
With many raunges reard along the wall,
And one great chimney, whose long tonnell thence
The smoke forth threw. Spenser, F. Q., II. ix. 29.

Every thing whereupon any part of their carcase falleth shall be unclean; whether it be oven, or ranges for pots, they shall be broken down. Lev. xi. 35.

And so home, where I found all clean, and the hearth and range, as it is now enlarged, both up.
Pepys, Diary, May 25, 1661.

10. A step of a ladder; a round; a rung. [Obsolete or local.]

The first range of that ladder which should serve to mount over all their customs. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

11. Naut.: (a†) A large cleat with two arms or branches, bolted in the waist of ships to belay the tacks and sheets to. (b) A certain quantity of cable hauled up on deck from the chain-locker, of a length slightly greater than the depth of water, in order that the anchor, when let go, may reach the bottom without being checked. —12. In shoemaking, a strip cut from a butt or side of sole-leather.

The butt is first cut into long strips known as ranges, of varying width according to the purposes for which required. Ure, Dict., IV. 110.

13. A bolting-sieve for meal. Cotgrave; Halliwell. [Old and prov. Eng.]—Battle-range. See battle[1].—Broken-range stonework, range stonework in which thicker or thinner stones are occasionally inserted, thus breaking the uniformity. Compare random stonework, under random.—Constituent of a range. See constituent.—Double-oven range, a range which has two ovens, one on each side of the fire-pot.—Point-blank range. See point-blank.—Random-range ashler. See ashler[3].—Range curve. See curve.—Range stonework, masonry laid in courses. The courses may vary in height, but in each a level joint is preserved.—Single-oven range, a range having but one oven, usually at one side of the fire-pot: in contradistinction to double-oven range.—To get the range of anything, to find by experiment and calculation the exact angle of elevation of the gun, the amount of charge, etc., necessary to throw projectiles so as to strike the object aimed at.=Syn. 1. Line, tier, file.—4. Sweep, reach.

rangé (roṅ-zhā′), n. [F., pp. of ranger, range, order: see range, v.] In her., arranged in order: said of small bearings set in a row fesse-wise, or the like. The epithet is not often needed: thus, "six mullets in bend or bendwise" is sufficient without the use of the expression "rangé in bend."

ranged (rānjd), p. a. [Pp. of range, v.] 1. Set in a row, line, or other definite order.—A ranged battle†, a pitched battle. N. E. D.

That army of saints, which fought the king's forces on Pentland Hills in a ranged battel, 1666.
G. Hickes, Spirit of Popery, p. 11. N. E. D.

range-finder (rānj′fīn″dėr), n. An instrument used for determining the distance or range of an object so that guns can be accurately sighted when firing at it. A large number of devices of various types have been invented for this purpose, some of which are of use only on land, while others are principally used at sea. See position-finder.

range-heads (rānj′hedz), n. pl. Naut., the windlass-bitts.

range-lights (rānj′līts), n. pl. 1. Two or more lights, generally in lighthouses, so placed that when kept in line a fair course can be made through a channel: where two channels meet, the bringing of two range-lights into line serves to mark the turning-point into the new channel. —2. Lights placed aboard ship at a considerable horizontal distance from each other, and in the same vertical plane with the keel. They are used to give a better indication of changes of course to approaching vessels than is afforded by the ordinary side and steaming lights.

rangement† (rānj′mėnt), n. [< OF. rangement, < renger, ranger, range: see range, v.] The act of ranging; arrangement.

Lodgement, rangement, and adjustment of our other ideas. Waterland, Works, IV. 468.

★ranger (rān′jėr), n. [Early mod. E. also raunger; < range + -er[1]. Cf. F. rangeur, one who arranges.] 1. One who ranges, or roams, or roves about; especially, one engaged in ranging or going about for some specific purpose, as search or ward.

O where are all my rangers bold,
That I pay meat and fee
To search the forest far an' wide?
Young Akin (Child's Ballads, I. 186).

Specifically — 2. In England, formerly, a sworn officer of a forest, appointed by the king's letters patent, whose business it was to walk through the forest, watch the deer, prevent trespasses, etc.; now, merely a government official connected with a royal forest or park.

They [wolves] walke not widely as they were wont,
For feare of raungers and the great hunt.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., September.

3. One of a body of regular or irregular troops, or other armed men, employed in ranging over a region, either for its protection or as marauders: as, the Texan rangers. Military rangers are generally mounted, but may fight on foot if occasion requires. The name is sometimes used in the plural for a permanent body of troops, as the Connaught Rangers in the British army.

"Do you know, friend," said the scout gravely, . . . "that this is a band of rangers chosen for the most desperate service?" J. F. Cooper, Last of Mohicans, xxxii.

4. One who roves for plunder; a robber. [Rare.] —5. A dog that beats the ground.—6†. A sieve. Holland.—7. A kind of fish. See the quotation.

[At Gibraltar] the Sp. besugo, a kind of seabream, is called in English ranger. N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 278.

8. A kind of seal, probably the young bay-seal. [Newfoundland.]—Partizan ranger. See partizan[1].

rangerine (ran′jėr-in), a. Same as rangiferine.

Rangifer tarandus (Gray), the name usually given to the Old World species of rangerine deer, of which the American woodland and barren ground caribou are believed to be mere varieties. Amer. Cyc., XIV. 265.

rangership (rān'jėr-ship), n. [< ranger + -ship.] The office of ranger or keeper of a forest or park. Todd.

range-stove (rānj'stōv), n. A cooking-stove made like a range; a portable range.

range-table (rānj'tā″bl), n. A table for a particular firearm containing the range and the time of flight for each elevation, charge of powder, and kind of projectile.

Rangia (ran'ji-ą), n. [NL., named after Rang, a French conchologist.] 1. In conch., the typical genus of Rangiidæ. The R. cyrenoides is common in the States bordering on the Gulf of Mexico. Also called Gnathodon. Des Moulins, 1832.

2. In Actinozoa, a genus of ctenophorous acalephs, ranking as the type of a family. Agassiz, 1860.

Rangifer (ran'ji-fėr), n. [NL. (Hamilton Smith), perhaps accom. < OF. rangier, ranger, rancher, ranglier, a reindeer (appar. < Icel. hreinn = OSw. ren, reindeer), + L. fera, a wild beast.] A genus of Cervidæ, containing arctic and subarctic species with large irregularly branching horns in both sexes, the brow-antler of which is highly developed, usually unsymmetrical, and more or less palmate, and very broad spreading hoofs; the reindeer. See cuts under reindeer and caribou.

rangiferine (ran-jif'ę-rin), a. [< Rangifer + -ine[1].] Belonging or relating to the genus Rangifer; resembling a reindeer. Also rangerine.

Rangiidæ (ran-jī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Rangia + -idæ.] 1. A family of bivalves, typified by the genus Rangia. The animal has short siphons connected at the base, a large linguiform foot, long palpi, and two pairs of gills, of which the outer is narrow and appendiculate. The shell is equivalve with salient umbones, and the hinge has two cardinal teeth and anterior and posterior lateral teeth in each valve, as well as an internal median fossa and cartilage.

2. A family of eurystomatous ctenophorans, represented by the genus Rangia. It was based on an African species, and characterized by the deep indentation between the rows of locomotive flappers and a tentacle projecting from the angle of each indentation.

ranging-rod (rān'jing-rod), n. A surveyors' rod or pole.

Rangoon creeper. See Quisqualis.

Rangoon tar. See tar.

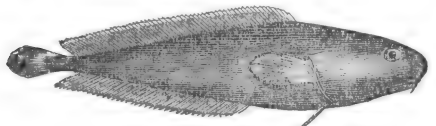
rangy (rān'ji), a. [< range + -y[1].] 1. In stock-breeding, adapted for ranging or running about, or indicating such adaptation; quick or easy in movement; of roving character or capability: as, a rangy yoke of oxen (that is, good travelers, capable of making good speed, as in plowing); rangy steers (that is, steers disposed to wander away to a distance, as on a stock-range). The word is also sometimes applied to a roving person, as a lad who wanders from home, or who has a predilection for a roving life, as that of a sailor. [U. S.]



> The ponies . . . used for the circle-riding in the morning have need rather to be strong and rangey.
> T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, i.

2. Having or permitting range or scope; roomy; commodious. [U. S.]

> A large rangy shed for the horses.
> Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 452.

rani, ranee (rä'nē), n. [Also rany, rannee, ranny; < Hindi rānī, < Skt. rājnī, queen, fem. of rājan: see raja.] In India, the wife of a raja, or a reigning princess; a queen.

Raniceps (ran'i-seps), n. [NL., < L. rana, a frog, + caput, head.] 1. In ichth., a Cuvierian genus of gadoid fishes, typical of the family Ranicipitidæ. R. raninus is known as the tadpole-hake.—2. In herpet., a genus of fossil labyrinthodont amphibians of the Carboniferous.

Tadpole-hake (Raniceps raninus).

Ranicipitidæ (ran″i-si-pit'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Raniceps (Ranicipit-) + -idæ.] A family of gadoid fishes, represented by the genus Raniceps. Their characters are mostly shared with the Gadidæ, but the suborbital chain is enlarged and continued backward over the operculum, the suspensorium of the lower jaw is very oblique, and the pyloric cæca are rudimentary or reduced to two.

Ranidæ (ran'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Rana[1] + -idæ.] A family of firmisternal salient amphibians, typified by the genus Rana, with premaxillary and maxillary teeth, subcylindrical sacral diapophyses and precoracoids, and with omosternum; the frog family. It is the most extensive family of batrachians, about 250 species, of several genera, being known. See frog[1], and cuts under omosternum and Rana[1].

raniform (ran'i-fôrm), a. [< NL. raniformis, < L. rana, a frog, + forma, form.] Frog-like; resembling or related to a frog; belonging to the Raniformes; ranine: distinguished from bufoniform.

Raniformes (ran-i-fôr'mēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of raniformis: see raniform.] A division of batrachians, including the true frogs: distinguished from Bufoniformes.

Ranina[1] (rą-nī'nä), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1801), fem. sing. of raninus: see ranine.] In Crustacea, the typical genus of Raninidæ, containing such frog-crabs as R. dorsipeda.

Frog-crab (Ranina dorsipeda), natural size.

Ranina[2] (rą-nī'nä), n. pl. [NL., < Rana[1] + -ina[2].] In Günther's classification, a division of oxydactyl opisthoglossate batrachians, containing 6 families of frogs.

Raninæ (rą-nī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Rana[1] + -inæ.] The true frogs as a subfamily of batrachians, corresponding to the family Ranidæ.

ranine (rā'nin), a. [< F. ranin, < NL. raninus, < L. rana, a frog: see Rana[1].] 1. In herpet., pertaining to frogs; related or belonging to the Ranidæ; raniform.—2. In anat., pertaining to the under side of the tip of the tongue, where a tumor called a ranula is sometimes formed. The ranine artery is the termination of the lingual artery, running to the tip of the tongue; it is accompanied by the ranine vein.

raninian (rą-nin'i-an), a. and n. [< ranine + -ian.] I. a. Pertaining to the Raninidæ.

II. n. A crab of the family Raninidæ.

Raninidæ (rą-nin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ranina[1] + -idæ.] A family of anomurous crustaceans, typified by the genus Ranina. They have a smooth ovate-oblong carapace, the last pair of legs reduced and subdorsal, and the abdomen short, partially extended, and not folded under the thorax. The species are almost entirely confined to the tropics. See cut under Ranina[1].

raninoid (ran'i-noid), a. Pertaining to the Raninoidea; raninian.

Raninoidea (ran-i-noi'dē-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Ranina[1] + -oidea.] A superfamily of anomurous crustaceans, represented by the raninians.

ranite (ran'īt), n. [< Icel. Rān, a giant goddess, queen of the sea, + -ite[2].] A hydrated silicate of aluminium and sodium, derived from the alteration of elæolite: it occurs in southern Norway, and is essentially the same as hydronephelite.

ranivorous (rą-niv'ō-rus), a. [< L. rana, a frog, + vorare, devour.] Frog-eating; subsisting habitually or chiefly upon frogs: as, the marsh-hawk is ranivorous.

rank[1] (rangk), a. [< ME. rank, ranc, ronk, raunk, renk, strong, proud, also rancid (influenced by OF. rance, ranci, rancid: see rancid); < AS. ranc, proud, forward, arrogant, showy, bold, valiant, = D. Shak., Macbeth, iii. 1. 103.

These are all virtues of a meaner rank. Addison.

Specifically, of persons—(a) Titular distinction or dignity; gradation by hereditary, official, or other title: as, civil, judicial, or military rank; the rank of baron or marquis; the rank of general or admiral; the rank of ambassador or governor. The relative rank of officers of the United States army and navy is as follows: General ranks with admiral; lieutenant-general with vice-admiral; major-general with rear-admiral; brigadier-general with commodore; colonel with captain; lieutenant-colonel with commander; major with lieutenant-commander; captain with lieutenant (senior grade); first lieutenant with lieutenant (junior grade); second lieutenant with ensign.

The rank of an ambassador has nothing to do with the transaction of affairs.
Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, § 94.

(b) Eminent standing or dignity; especially, aristocratic station or hereditary distinction, as in European monarchies; inherited or conferred social eminence.

Respect for Rank, fifty years ago universal and profound, is rapidly decaying. There are still many left who believe in some kind of superiority by Divine Right and the Sovereign's gift of Rank, even though that Rank be but ten years old, and the grandfather's shop is still remembered.
W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 118.

5†. A ranging or roving; hence, discursive wandering; divagation; aberration.

Instead of a manly and sober form of devotion, all the extravagant ranks and silly freaks of enthusiasm!
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. ii.

6. In geom., the degree of a locus of lines. (a) The number of lines of a singly infinite system which cut any given line in tridimensional space. (b) The number of lines of a triply infinite system which lie in one plane and pass through one point in that plane.—A split in the ranks, dissension and division in a party, sect, society, or the like. [Colloq.]

They must submit to the humiliation of acknowledging a split in their own ranks.

Sae dauntingly gaed he;
He play'd a spring, and danc'd it round,
Below the gallows-tree.
Burns, Macpherson's Farewell.

rantipole (ran'ti-pōl), a. and n. [Appar. < ranty + pole = poll[1], head: see poll[1]. Cf. dodipoll.] I. a. Wild; roving; rakish.

Out upon't, at years of discretion, and comport yourself at this rantipole rate!
Congreve, Way of the World, iv. 10.

This rantipole hero had for some time singled out the blooming Katrina for the object of his uncouth gallantries.
Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 431.

II. n. A rude, romping boy or girl; a wild, reckless fellow.

What strange, awkward rantipole was that I saw thee speaking to?
J. Baillie.

I was always considered as a rantipole, for whom anything was good enough.
Marryat, Frank Mildmay, xv. (Davies.)

rantipole (ran'ti-pōl), v. i.; pret. and pp. rantipoled, ppr. rantipoling. [< rantipole, n.] To run about wildly.

The elder was a termagant, imperious wench; she used to rantipole about the house, pinch the children, kick the servants, and torture the cats and dogs. Arbuthnot.

rantism[1]† (ran'tizm), n. [< Gr. ῥαντισμός, a sprinkling, < ῥαντίζειν, sprinkle, besprinkle.] A sprinkling; hence, a small number; a handful. [Rare.]

We, but a handful to their heap, a rantism to their baptism. Bp. Andrews.

rantism[2] (ran'tizm), n. [< rant + -ism.] The practice or tenets of the Ranters; ranterism. Johnson.

rantle-tree, randle-tree (ran'tl-trē, -dl-trē), n. [Also raunel-tree. "Apparently of Scand. origin: cf. Norw. dial. randa-tre." N. E. D.] 1. A tree with two branches, which are cut short and left somewhat in the form of the letter Y, set close to or built into the gable of a cottage to support one end of the roof-tree.—2. A beam which runs from back to front of a chimney, and from which the crook is suspended.—3. A tall, raw-boned person.

If ever I see that auld randle-tree of a wife again, I'll gie her something to buy tobacco.
Scott, Guy Mannering, xxvi.

[Scotch in all uses.]

rantock (ran'tok), n. The goosander, Mergus merganser. [Orkneys.]

ran-tree (ran'trē), n. A dialectal variant of roan-tree. Also rantry.

ranty (ran'ti), a. and n. [< rant + -y[1].] Same as randy. [Prov. Eng.]

ranula (ran'ū-lä), n.; pl. ranulæ (-lē). [= F. ranule, < L. ranula, a little frog, also a small swelling on the tongue of cattle, dim. of rana, a frog: see Rana[1].] A cystic tumor caused by the obstruction of the duct of a small mucous gland on the under surface of the tongue, the so-called Blandin-Nuhn gland. The term has been applied, however, with considerable looseness, to other tumors in or near this place presenting some resemblance to true ranulæ.

ranular (ran'ū-lär), a. [= F. ranulaire; as ranula + -ar[3].] Of or pertaining to a ranula; of the character of a ranula.

Ranunculaceæ (rā-nung-kū-lā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1789), < Ranunculus + -aceæ.] A family of choripetalous plants of the order Ranales, characterized by the numerous stamens inserted on the receptacle, five deciduous and commonly colored sepals, not more than one complete circle of petals, and seeds with a minute embryo in fleshy albumen, and without an aril. They have usually many separate pistils which mature into distinct dry fruits, either achenes or follicles, or coalesce into berries. The species, estimated by Engler at 1,200, by Britton at 1,050, are included in 3 tribes and 30 genera. They occur throughout the world, but in the tropics more rarely and chiefly on mountains, elsewhere forming a conspicuous part of the flora of almost every region, especially in Europe, which contains one fifth, and in North America, which has one seventeenth, of all the species. Their wide distribution is aided by the long-continued vitality of the seeds, many of which are also remarkably slow to germinate after planting, those of several species requiring two years. They are annual or perennial herbs—rarely undershrubs, as Zanthorhiza. Many have dissected alternate or radical leaves, the petiole with an expanded sheathing base, but without stipules; Clematis is exceptional in its opposite leaves and climbing stem. The family is often known as the buttercup or crowfoot family, from the type, and contains an unusually large proportion of other characteristic plants, as the hepatica of America, the Christmas rose of Germany, and the lesser celandine of England. It includes also many of the most beautiful flowers of garden cultivation. Most of the species contain in their colorless juice an acrid and caustic principle, which sometimes becomes a dangerous narcotic poison, is often of great medicinal value (see hellebore, aconite, Hydrastis, Actæa, Cimicifuga), is usually most concentrated in the roots, but very volatile in the foliage and stems, and is dissipated by drying or in water, but intensified by the action of acids, alcohol, etc. The family was one of the earliest to be defined by botanists with substantially its present limits (as Multisiliquæ by Linnæus, 1751), and has long been placed at the head of the polypetalous families of dicotyledons, standing as the first family of plants in the older classifications, from de Candolle in 1819 to Durand in 1888.

ranunculaceous (rā-nung-kū-lā'shius), a. [< NL. ranunculaceus, < Ranunculus, q. v. Cf. Ranunculaceæ.] Of or pertaining to the Ranunculaceæ; resembling the ranunculus.

Ranunculeæ (rā-nung-kū'lē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Necker, 1770), < Ranunculus + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Ranunculaceæ. It was originally used for the family and later made a tribe. In the system of Bentham and Hooker it included only four genera: Ranunculus (the type), Trautvetteria, Hamadryas, and Oxygraphis, which, in Engler's classification, would form a sort of subtribe of the tribe Anemoneæ.

Ranunculus (rā-nung'kū-lus), n. [NL. (Kaspard Bauhin, 1623), < L. ranunculus, a medicinal plant, also called batrachion, perhaps crowfoot (> It. ranuncolo, Sp. ranúnculo, Pg. ranunculo, D. ranonkel, G. Dan. Sw. ranunkel, crowfoot), dim. of rana, a frog: see Rana[1].] 1. A large genus of choripetalous plants, type of the family Ranunculaceæ and of the tribe Ranunculeæ. It is characterized by the perfect flowers with from three to five caducous sepals, three to five or even fifteen conspicuous petals, each marked at the base by a nectar-bearing scale or pit, and by the many achenes in a head or spike, each beaked with a short persistent style. There are about 200 species, scattered throughout the world, abundant in temperate and cold regions, with a few on mountain-tops in the tropics; 15 species are British, and over 80 occur in North America, of which about 30 are found in the Atlantic States. The genus is remarkable for its development northward, extending to the Aleutian Islands and Point Barrow, and even to Fort Conger, 81° 44′ north. Others extend well to the south, as the Fuegian R. biternatus. The species have usually a perennial base or rootstock, and bear deeply divided leaves, entire in a few species, and yellow or white terminal flowers, which are generally bright and showy, and have numerous and conspicuous short yellow stamens and a smaller central mass of yellow or greenish pistils. The more common species, with bright-yellow flowers and palmately divided leaves, are known as buttercup and crowfoot, especially R. acris and R. bulbosus, which have also the old local names of butter-flower, butter-daisy, blister-plant, crow-flower, and in Scotland yellow gowan. (See also goldcup, and cut under ovary[1].) A number of yellow species are cultivated under the name garden ranunculus, as R. bulbosus, a favorite source of cut flowers, and especially the Persian R. Asiaticus, with three-parted leaves, parent of a hundred varieties, mostly double, and including scarlet and other colors. R. aconitifolius, a tall European species with five-parted leaves, is cultivated in white double-flowered varieties under the names bachelor's-buttons and fair-maids-of-France or -of-Kent. The bright-yellow flowers of R. insignis, a densely woolly New Zealand species, are nearly 2 inches across. Several white-flowered species are remarkable for their growth in rock-crevices amid perpetual snow, especially R. glacialis of the Alps and arctic Europe, and also the yellow-flowered R. Thora, the mountain wolf's-bane. A few weedy species have prickly fruit, as R. arvensis of Europe and southern Asia (for which see hungerweed, hedgehog, 3, and joy, 4). Many species are so acrid as to raise blisters when freshly gathered, but are sometimes eaten, when dried, by cattle. R. sceleratus, said to be the most acrid species, is eaten boiled as a salad in Wallachia, as are also the roots of R. bulbosus, the acridity disappearing on boiling. R. auricomus (see goldilocks, 1) is exceptional in the absence of this acrid principle. Several species, called water-crowfoots, are immersed aquatics with finely dissected foliage, forming deep-green feathery masses which bear white emersed flowers; among them is R. Lyallii of New Zealand, one of the most ornamental species, there known as water-lily. The yellow water-crowfoot, R. delphinifolius, found from Maine to North Carolina and westward to Kansas, has kidney-shaped and cut floating leaves. Several species with long and mainly undivided leaves are known as spearwort. See also cut under achenium.

Flowering Plant of Ranunculus bulbosus (buttercup).

2. [l. c.; pl. ranunculi (-lī).] A plant of the genus Ranunculus.

There be foure kindes of Ranunculus, or Crowfoote.
Boyle, Useful Exp. Nat. Philos., II. ii. 42.

ranverset, v. t. See renverse.

Ranvier's nodes. See nodes of Ranvier, under node.

Ranzania (ran-zā'ni-ä), n. [NL., named (in def. 1 by Nardo, 1840) after C. Ranzani, an Italian naturalist.] 1. In ichth., a genus of gymnodont fishes of the family Molidæ.—2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects.

ranz des vaches (roⁿs dā vàsh). [Swiss F. (see def.), explained as lit. (a) 'the lowing of the cows': Swiss dial. ranz, connected, in this view, with G. ranzen, make a noise, drum with the fingers (cf. ranken, bray as an ass); des, comp. of de, of, and les, pl. of def. art.; vaches, pl. of vache, < L. vacca, a cow (see vaccine); (b) in another view, 'the line of cows,' ranz being taken as a var. of rangs, pl. of rang, row, line (because the cows fall into line when they hear the alpenhorn): see rank[2].] One of the melodies or signals of the Swiss herdsmen, commonly played on the alpenhorn. It consists of irregular phrases made up of the harmonic tones of the horn, which are singularly effective in the open air and combined with mountain echoes. The melodies vary in the different cantons. They are sometimes sung.

Raoulia (rā-ō'li-ä), n. [NL. (Sir J. D. Hooker, 1846), named after E. Raoul, a French naval surgeon, who wrote on New Zealand plants in 1846.] A genus of composite plants of the tribe Inuleæ and subtribe Gnaphalinæ. It is characterized by the solitary, sessile, and terminal heads of many flowers, which are mostly perfect and fertile, the outer circles of pistillate flowers being only one or two, or less than in the related genus Gnaphalium (the everlasting), but more than in the other next allied genus, Helichrysum. All the flowers bear a bifid style and a pappus which is not plumose. The 16 species are mostly natives of New Zealand, and are small densely tufted plants of rocky mountainous places, resembling mosses, with numerous branches thickly clothed with minute leaves. They bear white starry flower-heads, one at the end of each short twig, closely surrounded with leaves, and in R. grandiflora and others ornamented by an involucre with white bracts. R. eximia and R. mammillaris are known in New Zealand as sheep-plants, from their growth in sheep-pastures in large white woolly tufts, readily mistaken for sheep even at a short distance.

rap[1] (rap), v.; pret. and pp. rapped or rapt, ppr. rapping. [< ME. rappen, < Sw. rappa, strike, beat, rap; cf. rap[1], n. Cf. MHG. freq. raffeln, G. rappeln, intr., rattle. Perhaps connected with rap[2].] I. trans. 1. To beat upon; strike heavily or smartly; give a quick, sharp blow to, as with the fist, a door-knocker, a stick, or the like; knock upon.

His hote newe chosen love he chaunged into hate,
And sodainly with mighty mace gan rap hir on the pate.
Gascoigne, In Praise of Lady Sandes.

With one great Peal they rap the Door,
Like Footmen on a Visiting Day.
Prior, The Dove, st. 9.

2. To use in striking; make a blow or blows with. [Rare.]

Dunstan, as he went along through the gathering mist, was always rapping his whip somewhere.
George Eliot, Silas Marner, iv.

3. To utter sharply; speak out: usually with out (see phrase below).

One raps an oath, another deals a curse;
He never better bowl'd; this never worse.
Quarles, Emblems, i. 10.

To rap out. (a) To throw out violently or suddenly in speech; utter in a forcible or striking manner: as, to rap out an oath or a lie.

He could roundlie rap out so manie vgle othes.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 57.

The first was a judge, who rapped out a great oath at his footman. Addison, Freeholder, No. 44.

(b) To produce or indicate by rapping sounds; impart by a series of significant raps: as, to rap out a communication or a signal: used specifically of the supposed transmission of spiritual intelligence in this way through the instrumentality of mediums. =Syn. 1. To thump, whack.

II. intrans. 1†. To deal a heavy blow or heavy blows; beat.

The elementes gonne to rusche & rappe,
And smet downe chirches & templis with crak.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 206.

2†. To fall with a stroke or blow; drop so as to strike.

Now, by this time the tears were rapping down Upon her milk-white breast, aneth her gown.
Ross, Helenore, p. 70. (Jamieson.)

3. To strike a quick, sharp blow; make a sound by knocking, as on a door: as, to rap for admittance.

Villain, I say, knock me at this gate,
And rap me well. Shak., T. of the S., i. 2. 12.

Whan she cam to the king's court,
She rappit wi' a ring.
Earl Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 397).

Comes a dun in the morning and raps at my door.
Shenstone, Poet and Dun.

4. To take an oath; swear; especially, to swear falsely: compare to rap out (a), above. [Thieves' cant.]

It was his constant maxim that he was a pitiful fellow who would stick at a little rapping for his friend.
Fielding, Jonathan Wild, i. 13. (Davies.)

rap[1] (rap), n. [< ME. rap, rappe = Sw. Norw. rapp = Dan. rap, a rap, tap, smart blow; cf. rap[1], v.] 1. A heavy or quick, smart blow; a sharp or resounding knock; concussion from striking.

The right arme with a rappe reft fro the shuldurs.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 7680.

And therewith (as in great anger) he clapped his fyste on the borde a great rappe. Hall, Edw. V.

Bolus arriv'd, and gave a doubtful tap,
Between a single and a double rap.
Colman the Younger, Broad Grins, The Newcastle Apothecary.

2. A sound produced by knocking, as at a door, or by any sharp concussion; specifically, in modern spiritualism, a ticking or knocking noise produced by no apparent physical means, and ascribed to the agency of disembodied spirits.

We may first take the raps and the "astral bells," which Mr. Sinnett seems to regard as constituting important test phenomena.
R. Hodgson, Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 261.

rap[2] (rap), v. t.; pret. and pp. rapped or rapt, ppr. rapping. [< ME. rappen, < Sw. rappa, snatch, seize, carry off, = MHG. G. raffen, snatch; dial. (LG.) rappen, snatch up, take up (> ult. E. raff). Cf. rape[1] and rape[2]. The pp. rapped, rapt, became confused with rapt, < L. raptus, pp. of rapere, snatch, which is not connected with the Teut. word: see rapt[1], rapt[2].] 1†. To snatch or hurry away; seize by violence; carry off; transport; ravish.

Some shall be rapt and taken alive, as St. Paul saith.
Latimer, 2d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

Thiuk ye that . . . they will not pluck from you whatsoever they can rap or reave?
Apostolic Benediction of Adrian VI., Nov. 25, 1522 (Foxe's Martyrs, II. 59).

He ever hastens to the end, and so (As if he knew it) raps his hearer to
The middle of his matter.
B. Jonson, tr. of Horace's Art of Poetry.

But when these people grew niggardly in their offerings, it [the room] was rapt from thence.
Sandys, Travailes, p. 160.

Rapt in a chariot drawn by fiery steeds.
Milton, P. L., iii. 522.

2. To transport out of one's self; affect with ecstasy or rapture; carry away; absorb; engross.

What, dear sir,
Thus raps you? Are you well?
Shak., Cymbeline, i. 6. 51.

I found thee weeping, and . . .
Am rapt with joy to see my Marcia's tears.
Addison, Cato, iv. 3.

Rapt into future times, the bard begun.
Pope, Messiah, l. 7.

To rap and rend (originally to rape and ren: see rape[2]), to seize and strip; fall on and plunder; snatch by violence.

All they could rap, and rend, and pilfer,
To scraps and ends of gold and silver.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. ii. 789.

From foe and from friend
He'd rap and he'd rend, . . .
That Holy Church might have more to spend.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 206.

rap[3] (rap), v. t.; pret. and pp. rapped, ppr. rapping. [Also rape; prob. due in part to rap[1], but in part representing ME. repen, < AS. hrepian, touch, treat, = OFries. reppa, touch, move, = MD. reppen, move, = LG. reppen, touch, move, > G. rappen, scrape, = Icel. hreppa, catch, obtain, = Sw. repa, scratch. Cf. rape[6].] To scratch. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

rap[4] (rap), n. [Perhaps a particular use of rap[1]. There is nothing to connect the word with MHG. G. rappe, a coin so called: see rappe[2].] A counterfeit coin of bad metal which passed current in Ireland for a halfpenny in the reign of George I., before the issue of Wood's halfpence. Its intrinsic value was half a farthing. Hence the phrases not worth a rap, to care not a rap, implying something of no value.

It having been many years since copper halfpence or farthings were last coined in this Kingdom, they have been for some time very scarce, and many counterfeits passed about under the name of raps.
Swift, Drapier's Letters, letter i.

They [his pockets] was turned out afore, and the devil a rap's left. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 76.

I don't care a rap where I go.
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 201.

Rap halfpenny, a rap.

It is not of very great moment to me that I am now and then imposed on by a rap halfpenny.
Blackwood's Mag., XCVI. 392.

rap[5]†, n. A Middle English form of rope.

rap[6]†. A Middle English preterit of reap. Wyclif.

rap[7] (rap), n. [Origin obscure.] A lay or skein of yarn containing 120 yards. E. H. Knight.

Rapaces (rā-pā'sēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. rapax, rapacious: see rapacious.] 1. In mammal., the beasts of prey; carnivorous quadrupeds; the Carnivora, now called Feræ. Also Rapacia.—2. In ornith., the birds of prey; rapacious birds; the Accipitres or Raptores.

Rapacia (rā-pā'shi-ą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. rapax: see Rapaces.] Rapacious mammals; beasts of prey: synonymous with Rapaces, 1.

rapacious (rā-pā'shus), a. [= F. rapace = Pr. rapatz = Sp. rapaz = It. rapace, < L. rapax (rapac-), rapacious, < rapere, seize: see rape[2].] 1. Of a grasping habit or disposition; given to seizing for plunder or the satisfaction of greed, or obtaining wrongfully or by extortion; predatory; extortionate: as, a rapacious usurer; specifically, of animals, subsisting by capture of living prey; raptorial; predaceous: as, rapacious birds or fishes.

What trench can intercept, what fort withstand
The brutal soldier's rude rapacious hand.
Rowe, tr. of Lucan's Pharsalia, vii.

A rapacious man he [Warren Hastings] certainly was not. Had he been so, he would infallibly have returned to his country the richest subject in Europe.
Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

2. Of a grasping nature or character; characterized by rapacity; immoderately exacting; extortionate: as, a rapacious disposition; rapacious demands.

Well may then thy Lord, appeased,
Redeem thee quite from Death's rapacious claim.
Milton, P. L., xi. 258.

There are two sorts of avarice; the one is but of a bastard kind, and that is the rapacious appetite of gain.
Cowley, Avarice.

=Syn. 1. Rapacious, Ravenous, Voracious. Rapacious, literally disposed to seize, may note, as the others do not, a distinctive characteristic of certain classes of animals; the tiger is a rapacious animal, but often not ravenous or voracious. Ravenous implies hunger of an extreme sort, shown in eagerness to eat. Voracious means that one eats or is disposed to eat a great deal, without reference to the degree of hunger: a glutton is voracious. Samuel Johnson tended to be a voracious eater, because in his early life he had often gone hungry till he was ravenous.

rapaciously (rā-pā'shus-li), adv. In a rapacious manner; by rapine; by violent seizure.

rapaciousness (rā-pā'shus-nes), n. The character of being rapacious; inclination to seize violently or unjustly.

rapacity (rā-pas'i-ti), n. [< F. rapacité = Pr. rapacitat = Sp. rapacidad = Pg. rapacidade = It. rapacità, < L. rapacita(t-)s, rapacity, < rapax (rapac-), rapacious: see rapacious.] The character of being rapacious; the exercise of a rapacious or predaceous disposition; the act or practice of seizing by force, as plunder or prey, or of obtaining by extortion or chicanery, as unjust gains: as, the rapacity of pirates, of usurers, or of wild beasts.

Our wild profusion, the source of insatiable rapacity.
Bolingbroke, To Pope.

In the East the rapacity of monarchs has sometimes gone to the extent of taking from cultivators so much of their produce as to have afterwards to return part for seed.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 443.

rapadura (rap-a-dō'rą), n. [Also rappadura; < Sp. Pg. rapadura, shavings or scrapings, < rapar, shave, scrape, = F. râper, OF. rasper, scrape: see rasp[1], v.] A coarse unclarified sugar, made in Mexico and some parts of South America, and cast in molds.

raparee, n. See rapparee.

Rapatea (rą-pā'tē-ą), n. [NL. (Aublet, 1775), from a native name in Guiana.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, the type of the family Rapateaceæ. It is characterized by an ovary with three cells and three ovules, six anthers each with a spiral appendage, and numerous flowers in a globose head with an involucre of two long leaf-like bracts dilated at the base, and each flower provided with many closely imbricated obtuse appressed bractlets. There are five or six species, natives of Guiana and northern Brazil. They bear long and narrow radical leaves from a low or robust rootstock, and flowers on a leafless scape, each with three rigid and chaff-like erect sepals, and three broad and spreading petals united below into a hyaline tube.

Rapateaceæ (rą-pā-tē-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Dumortier, 1829), < Rapatea + -aceæ.] A family of monocotyledonous plants of the order Xyridales, typified by the genus Rapatea. It is characterized by regular flowers with three greenish sepals and three petals, six stamens with long anthers opening by a pore, a three-celled ovary with few or solitary anatropous ovules, and a lenticular embryo in farinaceous albumen. It includes about 23 species, of 7 genera. They are perennial herbs, natives of Brazil, Guiana, and Venezuela, except one monotypic genus of western Africa, and are mostly robust marsh-plants, with long radical tapering leaves, sessile or petioled, and flowers on a naked scape, commonly in dense involucrate heads resembling those of the composite plants.

rape[1]† (rāp), v. i. [< ME. rapen, < Icel. hrapa, fall, rush headlong, hurry, hasten, = Norw. rapa, slip, fall, = Dan. rappe, make haste; cf. MLG. reppen, hasten, hurry, G. refl. rappeln, hasten, hurry. Cf. rape[1], a. and n., also rape[2], rap[2], of which rape[1] is in part a doublet.] To make haste; hasten; hurry: often used reflexively.

Pas fro my presens on payne of thi lyffe, rape[2] (rāp), v.; pret. and pp. raped, ppr. raping. [< ME. rapen (= MD. rapen, raepen, D. rapen, gather, = MLG. LG. rapen, snatch, seize, = Norw. rapa, tear off), a var. of rappen, seize: see rap[2]. This verb has been partly confused with L. rapere, seize, whence ult. E. rapid, rapine, rapacious, rapt[2], etc.: see rap[2], rapt[1], rapt[2], etc.] I. intrans. 1†. To seize and carry off; snatch up; seize; steal.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 6516.

Ravenows fiches han sum mesure; whanne thei hungren thei rayn; whanne thei ben ful they sparyn.
Wimbelton's Sermon, 1388, MS. Hatton 57, p. 16. (Halliwell.)

2. To commit the crime of rape.

There 's nothing new, Menippus; as before,
They rape, extort, forswear.
Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels (1635), p. 349. (Latham.)

II. trans. 1. To carry off violently; hence, figuratively, to enrapture; ravish.

To rape the fields with touches of her string.
Drayton, Eclogues, v.

My son, I hope, hath met within my threshold
None of these household precedents, which are strong,
And swift to rape youth to their precipice.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, ii. 3.

2. To commit rape upon; ravish.—To rape and rent†, to seize and plunder. Compare to rap and rend, under rap[2].

For, though ye loke never so brode and stare,
Ye shul nat winne a myte in that chaffare,
But wasten al that ye may rape and renne.
Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 411.

rape[2] (rāp), n. [< rape[2], v.] 1. The act of snatching by force; a seizing and carrying away by force or violence, whether of persons or things; violent seizure and carrying away: as, the rape of Proserpine; the rape of the Sabine women; Pope's "Rape of the Lock."

Death is cruell, suffering none escape;
Olde, young, rich, poore, of all he makes his rape.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 128.

Pear grew after pear,
Fig after fig came; time made never rape
Of any dainty there. Chapman, Odyssey.

2. In law, the violation or carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly and against her will. Forcibly is usually understood not necessarily to mean violence, but to include negative consent. Statutes in various jurisdictions modify the definition, some by extending it to include carnal knowledge of a girl under 10 either with or without her consent. Rape is regarded as one of the worst felonies. The penalty for it was formerly death, as it is still in some jurisdictions, but is now generally imprisonment for life or for a long term of years. It is now often called criminal assault.

3. Something taken or seized and carried away; a captured person or thing. [Rare.]

Where now are all my hopes? oh, never more Shall they revive, nor Death her rapes restore!
Sandys.

Rape of the forest, in Eng. law, trespass committed in the forest by violence.

rape[3] (rāp), n. [< Icel. hreppr, a district, prob. orig. 'share' or 'allotment,' < Icel. hreppa, catch, obtain, = AS. hrepian, hreppan, touch: see rap[3].] A division of the county of Sussex, in England, intermediate between a hundred and the shire. The county is divided into six rapes.

The Rape . . . is . . . a mere geographical expression, the judicial organisation remaining in the hundred.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 45.

rape[4] (rāp), n. [< ME. rape, also rave, < OF. rape*, also rabe, later rave, F. dial. reuve, reve, rabe, rova = Pr. Sp. raba, rape, turnip (cf. Pg. rabão, horse-radish), = D. raap = OHG. raba, MHG. rabe, rape, rappe, rape, turnip, G. rapps, rape-seed, = LG. raap, rape; akin to OHG. ruoba, ruoppa, MHG. ruobe, rüebe, G. rübe, rape, turnip, etc., = LG. rove, rowe = Dan. roe = Sw. rofva, turnip; cf. OBulg. riepa = Serv. repa = Bohem. rzhepa = Pol. rzepa = Russ. riepa = Lith. rope, rape = Albanian repe, a turnip, < L. rapa, also rapum, a turnip, rape, = Gr. ῥάπυς, ῥάφυς, turnip; cf. Gr. ῥαφανίς, ῥαφάνη, a radish; ῥάφανος, a cabbage; root unknown.] 1†. A turnip. Halliwell.—2. The colza, coleseed, or rape-seed, a cruciferous plant, Brassica Napus. Rape closely resembles the rutabaga in many respects but differs from it in not having a thickened root and in producing much greater leaf-growth. Rape is extensively grown in Europe and in India for its oleaginous seeds, the source of rape-oil. It is also sown for its leaves, which are used as food for sheep, and are produced in gardens for use as a salad. When cut and used as a green forage crop several harvests may be made from the same area in a season without reseeding.

rape[5] (rāp), n. [< ME. rape = MHG. rappe, rape, G. rapp, a stalk of grapes, < OF. rape, F. râpe = Pr. raspa = It. raspo, a stem or stalk of grapes.] 1. The stem or stalk of grapes.

Til grapes to the presse beo set Ther renneth no red wyn in rape.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 135.

2. pl. The stalks and skins of grapes from which the must has been expressed. E. H. Knight.—3. Loose or refuse grapes used in wine-making.

The juice of grapes is drawn as well from the rape, or whole grapes plucked from the cluster, and wine poured upon them in a vessel, as from a vat, where they are bruised. Ray.

4. A filter used in a vinegar-manufactory to separate the mucilaginous matter from the vinegar. It derives its name from being charged with rapes. E. H. Knight.

rape[6] (rāp), v. t.; pret. and pp. raped, ppr. raping. [Prob. a var. of rap[3], perhaps affected by F. râper (= Sp. Pg. rapar), rasp: see rasp[1].] To scratch; abrade; scarify. [Prov. Eng.]

Interesting reading; wasn't it? I wish they'd rape the character of some other innocent—ha!
The Money-makers, p. 78.

rape[7] (rāp), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of rope.

rape-butterfly (rāp'but″ėr-flī), n. A pierian, Pontia rapæ, known in the United States as the imported cabbage-butterfly, to distinguish it from several similar native species. See cut under cabbage-butterfly, and compare figures under Pieris. [Eng.]

rape-cake (rāp'kāk), n. A hard cake formed of the residue of the seed and husks of rape (see rape[4]) after the oil has been expressed. It is used for feeding oxen and sheep, but is inferior to linseed-cake and some other kinds of oil-cakes; it is also used in considerable quantity as a rich manure.

rapeful† (rāp'fûl), a. [< rape[2] + -ful.] Given to rape or violence. [Rare.]

To teach the rapeful Hyeans marriage.
Chapman, Byron's Tragedy, iv. 1. (Nares.) rapely† (rāp'li), adv. [ME., also raply, rapliche, etc.; < rape[1], a., + -ly[2].] Hastily; hurriedly; quickly; rapidly.

Then seih we a Samaritan cam syttynge on a mule, Rydynge full raply the way that we wente.
Piers Plowman (C), xx. 48.

Upsterte the champioun rapely anon.
Tale of Gamelyn, l. 219.

rape-oil (rāp'oil), n. A thick brownish-yellow oil expressed from rape-seed. It was formerly, as in India still, applied chiefly to illumination, but is now largely consumed for lubricating and in india-rubber manufacturing. Also called cabbage-oil, colza-oil, rape-seed oil.

rape-seed (rāp'sēd), n. The seed of the rape, or the plant itself; cole-seed.—Rape-seed oil. Same as rape-oil.

rape-wine (rāp'wīn), n. A poor thin wine prepared from the murk or stalks, skins, and other refuse of grapes which have been pressed.

rap-full (rap'fûl), a. and n. [< rap[1] + full[1].] I. a. Full of wind: applied to sails when on a wind every sail stands full without lifting.

II. n. A sail full of wind: also called a smooth full.

rapfully† (rap'fûl-i), adv. With beating or striking; with resounding blows; batteringly. [Rare.]

Then far of vplandish we doe view thee fird Sicil Ætna,
And a seabelch grounting on rough rocks rapfulye frapping. Stanihurst, Æneid, iii.

Raphaelesque (raf″ā-el-esk′), a. [Also Raffaelesque; < Raphael (It. Raffaello), a chief painter of the Italian Renaissance (see Raphaelism), + -esque.] Of or resembling the style, color, or art of the great Renaissance painter Raphael (Raffaello Sanzio da Urbino).

A strange opulence of splendour, characterisable as half-legitimate half-meretricious—a splendour hovering between the raffaelesque and the japannish.
Carlyle, Sterling, i. 6.

Raphaelism (raf′ā-el-izm), n. [< Raphael (see def.) + -ism.] The principles of art introduced by Raphael, the famous Italian painter (1483–1520); the style or method of Raphael.

Raphaelite (raf′ā-el-īt), n. [< Raphael + -ite[2]: see Raphaelism.] One who adopts the principles or follows the style of the painter Raphael.

Raphaclitism (raf′ā-el-ī-tizm), n. [< Raphaelite + -ism.] The principles or methods of the Raphaelites; pursuit of or adherence to the style of the painter Raphael.

Raphaneæ (rā-fā′nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1821), < Raphanus + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Brassicaceæ. In the system of Bentham and Hooker it includes 9 genera, of which Raphanus is the type, all of them plants of the old world, and chiefly Asiatic. In that of Engler and Prantl it is not recognized, and the genera referred to it by other authors are more or less separated, mostly falling into the tribe Sinapeæ, but three of them are placed in the tribe Hesperideæ.

Raphanus (raf′a-nus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. raphanus, < Gr. ῥάφανος, cabbage, radish, ῥαφανίς, radish, akin to ῥάπυς, ῥάφυς, turnip, L. rapa, rapum, turnip: see rape[4].] A genus of cruciferous plants, including the radish, belonging to the tribe Sinapeæ. It is characterized by globose seeds, solitary in the single row of cells formed by constrictions of the pods, which are closed by a pithy substance or sometimes remain continuous throughout. The 10 species are natives of Europe and temperate parts of Asia, and are branching annuals or biennials, with fleshy roots, lyrate lower leaves, and elongated bractless racemes of slender-pedicelled white or yellow purplish-veined flowers, followed by erect spreading, thick, and corky or spongy pods. Some species (section Raphanistrum) have a short seedless joint below, forming a stalk to the long inflated necklace-like cell which composes the rest of the pod, as R. Landra, a yellow-flowered Italian weed, eaten as a salad, and R. Raphanistrum, a coarse weed, the wild or field radish. See radish.

★raphe (rā′fē), n. [NL., prop. rhaphe; < Gr. ῥαφή, a seam, suture, < ῥάπτειν, sew: see rhapsode.] 1. In bot.: (a) In an anatropous or amphitropous (hemitropous) ovule or seed, the adnate cord which connects the hilum with the chalaza, commonly appearing as a more or less salient ridge, sometimes completely embedded in a fleshy testa of the seed. See cuts under anatropous and hemitropous. (b) A longitudinal line or rib on the valves of many diatoms, connecting the three nodules when present. (See nodule.) The usual primary classification of genera depends upon its presence or absence.—2. In anat., a seam-like union of two lateral halves, usually in the mesial plane, and constituting either a median septum of connective tissue or a longitudinal ridge or furrow; specifically, in the brain, the median lamina of decussating fibers which extends in the tegmental region from the oblongata up to the third ventricle.—Raphe of the corpus callosum, a longitudinal furrow on the median line of its dorsal surface bounded by the mesial longitudinal striæ.—Raphe of the medulla oblongata, the median septum, composed of fibers which run in part dorsoventrally, in part longitudinally, and in part across the septum more or less obliquely, together with nerve-cells.—Raphe of the palate, a linear median ridge extending from a small papilla in front, corresponding with the inferior opening of the anterior palatine foramen, back to the uvula.—Raphe of the penis, the extension of the raphe of the scrotum forward on the under side of the penis.—Raphe of the perineum, the extension of the raphe of the scrotum backward on the perineum.—Raphe of the pharynx, the median seam on the posterior wall of the pharynx.—Raphe of the scrotum, a slight median ridge extending forward to the under side of the penis, and backward along the perineum to the margin of the anus.—Raphe of the tongue, a slight furrow along the middle of the dorsal surface, terminating posteriorly in the foramen cæcum.

Raphia (rā′fi-ä), n. [NL. (Palisot de Beauvois, 1804), < raffia, the native name of the Madagascar species.] A genus of palms of the tribe Metroxyleæ, type of the subtribe Raphieæ (which is distinguished from the true ratan-palms, Calameæ, by a completely three-celled ovary). It is characterized by pinnately divided leaves crowning an erect and robust trunk, and by a fruit which becomes one-celled, is beaked with the three terminal stigmas, and has a thick pericarp tessellated with overlapping scales, spongy within and containing a single oblong furrowed seed with very hard osseous albumen. There are 5 or 6 species, of Africa and Madagascar, with 1 or 2 in America, R. tædigera, the jupati-palm, occurring from the mouths of the Amazon to Nicaragua. All inhabit low swampy lands and banks near tide-water. Their trunks are unarmed and of little height, but their leaves are spiny and often over 50 feet in length, the entire tree becoming thus 60 or 70 feet in height to their erect tips. The large pendulous flower-spikes reach 6 feet in length, contain flowers of both sexes, and have their numerous branches set in two opposite rows, their flower-bearing branchlets resembling flattened catkins. In fruit the spike sometimes becomes 15 feet long, and weighs 200 or even 300 pounds, bearing numerous egg-like brown and hard fruits often used as ornaments. R. Ruffia, which produces the largest spadices, is known as the raffia-palm. (See raffia.) R. vinifera supplies the toddy of western tropical Africa, and its leafstalks are used in various ways.

raphides, n. Plural of raphis.

Raphidia (rā-fid′i-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1748), < Gr. ῥαφίς (ῥαφιδ-), a needle, a pin: see raphis.] A notable genus of neuropterous insects, typical of the family Raphidiidæ, commonly known as snake-flies. The prothorax is cylindrical, and the wings are furnished with a pterostigma. The larvæ are not aquatic and are carnivorous; they live under bark. The genus is represented in North America only on the Pacific coast, although common in Europe.

raphidian (rā-fid′i-an), a. 1. In bot., of the nature of or containing raphides: as, raphidian cells in a plant.—2. In zoöl., of or pertaining to the genus Raphidia.

raphidiferous (raf-i-dif′e-rus), a. [< Gr. ῥαφίς (ῥαφιδ-), a needle, pin, + L. ferre, bear, carry.] In bot., containing raphides.

Raphidiidæ (raf-i-dī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1824), < Raphidia + -idæ.] A family of neuropterous insects known as snake-flies.

raphigraph (raf′i-gráf), n. [< Gr. ῥαφίς, a needle, pin, + γράφειν, write.] A machine intended to provide a means of communication with the blind, by the use of characters made by pricking paper with ten needle-pointed pegs, actuated by a keyboard, and operating in conjunction with mechanism for shifting the paper. The machine has proved practically valueless from its complication and its extreme slowness of operation, resulting from the requisite number of motions.

★raphis (rā′fis), n.; pl. raphides (raf′i-dēz). [NL., < Gr. ῥαφίς, ῥαπίς, a needle, pin, < ῥάπτειν, sew, stitch. Cf. raphe.] In bot., one of the acicular crystals, composed of oxalate of lime, which occur in bundles in the cells of many plants. The term has less properly been used to include crystals of other forms found in the same situations. Also rhaphis.

rapping (rap′ing), a. [Ppr. of *rap*¹, v.] Remarkably large; of striking or astonishing size; "whopping." [Prov. Eng.]

Rappist (rap′ist), n. [< Rapp, name of the founder (see Harmonist, 4), + -ist.] Same as Harmonist, 4.

Rappite (rap′īt), n. [< Rapp (see Rappist) + *-ite*².] Same as Harmonist, 4.

rapport (ra-pōrt′), v. i. [< F. rapporter, relate, refer: see report, v.] To have relation or reference; relate; refer. [Rare.]

> When God hath imprinted an authority upon a person, . . . others are to pay the duty which that impression demands; which duty, because it rapports to God, and touches not the man, . . . extinguishes all pretences of opinion and pride. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 142.

★rapport (ra-pōr′), n. [F. rapport, OF. raport, account, also resemblance, correspondence, accord, agreement, = Pg. raporte = It. rapporto, report, relation: see report, n.] 1. Harmonious relation; correspondence; accord or agreement; affinity; analogy: used as a French word, often in the phrase en rapport, in or into close relation, accord, or harmony.

> It is obvious enough what rapport there is, and must ever be, between the thoughts and words, the conceptions and languages of every country.
> Sir W. Temple, Anc. and Mod. Learning.

2. In French law, a report on a case, or on a subject submitted; a return.

rapprochement (ra-prōsh′moṅ), n. [F., reunion, reconciliation, < rapprocher, approach again, < re-, back, + approcher, approach: see approach.] A coming or bringing together or into accord; establishment of harmonious relations; reconciliation.

The present rapprochement between the Turk and the Muscovite. The Academy, Dec. 15, 1888, p. 379.

He [Lewes] here seeks to effect a rapprochement between metaphysic and science. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 491.

rapscallion (rap-skal′yon), n. [A modified form of rascallion.] A rascally, disorderly, or despicable person; a wretch or vagabond; a rascallion.

Well, rapscallions! and what now!
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 87.

There isn't any low, friendless rapscallion in this town that hasn't got me for his friend.
Howells, Annie Kilburn, xi.

rapscallionry (rap-skal′yon-ri), n. [< rapscallion + -ry.] Rascals collectively. [Rare.]

rapt[1] (rapt). A preterit and past participle of rap[1].

rapt[2] (rapt), p. a. [Early mod. E. spelling of rapped, pp. of rap[2], confused with L. raptus, pp. of rapere, seize: see rap[2], and cf. rapt[3].] Seized with ecstasy; transported; exalted; ecstatic; in a state of rapture.

More dances my rapt heart
Than when I first my wedded mistress saw Bestride my threshold. Shak., Cor., iv. 5. 122.

Looks commercing with the skies,
Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes.
Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 40.

Their faces wore a rapt expression, as if sweet music were in the air around them.
Hawthorne, Hall of Fantasy.

rapt[3]† (rapt), v. t. [< L. raptare, seize and carry off, freq. of rapere, pp. raptus, seize: see rapt[2], and cf. rap[2], rape[2].] 1. To seize or grasp; seize and carry off; ravish.

The Lybian lion, . . .
Out-rushing from his den, rapts all away.
Daniel, Civil Wars, vii. 97.

We are a man distinct . . .
From those whom custom rapteth in her press.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

2. To transport as with ecstasy; enrapture.

So those that dwell in me, and live by frugal toil,
When they in my defence are reasoning of my soil,
As rapted with my wealth and beauties, learned grow.
Drayton, Polyolbion, xiii. 411.

★rapt[3]† (rapt), n. [< F. rapt, OF. rat, rap = Pr. rap = Sp. Pg. rapto = It. ratto, < L. raptus, a seizure, plundering, abduction, rape, ML. also forcible violation, < rapere, pp. raptus, seize, snatch: see rapt[2], a., and cf. rapture.] 1. Transporting force or energy; resistless movement.

And therefore in this Encyclopedie and round of knowledge, like the great and exemplary wheels of heaven, we must observe two circles: that while we are daily carried about, and whirled on by the swing and rapt of the one, we may maintain a natural proper course in the slow and sober wheel of the other. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., Pref.

2. An ecstasy; a trance.

Dissimulyng traunces and raptes.
Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 25.

He seemeth to lye as thoughe he were in great payne or in a rapte, wonderfully tormentynge hym selfe.
R. Eden, tr. of Gonzalus Oviedus (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 215).

An extraordinary rapt and act of prophesying.
Bp. Morton, Discharge of Imput. (1633), p. 174.

Raptatores (rap-tā-tō′rēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of raptator, < L. raptare, seize and carry off, waste, ravage, plunder: see rapt[2], rapt[3].] In ornith., same as Raptores. Illiger, 1811.

Raptatoria (rap-tā-tō′ri-ä), n. pl. [NL.: see ★Raptatores.] In entom., same as Raptoria.

raptatorial (rap-tā-tō′ri-al), a. [< raptatory + -al.] Same as raptorial.

raptatory (rap′tā-tō-ri), a. [< NL. raptatorius*, < raptator, a robber, plunderer: see Raptatores.] In entom., formed for seizing prey; raptorial.

rapter† (rap′tėr), n. Same as raptor, 1.

raptor (rap′tor), n. [= Sp. Pg. raptor = It. rattore, < L. raptor, robber, plunderer, abductor, < rapere, pp. raptus, seize, carry off: see rapt[2], rapt[3].] 1†. A ravisher; a plunderer.

To have her harmless life by the lewd rapter spilt.
Drayton, Polyolbion, x. 149.

2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of coleopterous insects.

Raptores (rap-tō′rēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. raptor, robber, plunderer: see raptor.] An order of Aves, the Accipitres of Linnæus, the Raptatores, Rapaces, or Aëtomorphæ of some authors; the raptorial or rapacious birds; the birds of prey. They have an epignathous cered beak, and talons generally fitted for grasping live prey. The bill is hooked and often also toothed. The toes are four, three in front and one behind, with large crooked claws; the outer toe is sometimes versatile. The plumage is aftershafted or not; the oil-gland is present and usually tufted. The carotids are two; the syrinx has not more than one pair of intrinsic muscles. Cæca are present (except in Cathartidæ). The maxillopalatines are united to an ossified septum; the angle of the mandible is not recurved. The Raptores are found in every part of the world. There are upward of 500 species, mostly belonging to the two families Falconidæ and Strigidæ. The Raptores are divided into 4 suborders or superfamilies: (1) the African Gypogeranides; (2) the American Cathartides; (3) the cosmopolitan diurnal birds of prey, Accipitres; and (4) the cosmopolitan nocturnal birds of prey, the owls, Striges.

Raptores.
1, head and foot of golden eagle (Aquila chrysaëtos); 2, head and foot of gerfalcon (Falco gyrfalco).

Raptoria (rap-tō′ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < L. raptor, robber: see Raptores.] In entom., in Westwood's system (1839), a division of orthopterous insects; the Mantidæ (which see). Westwood's Raptoria were a part of Latreille's Cursoria, the rest of which Westwood called Ambulatoria and Cursoria. Also Raptatoria.

raptorial (rap-tō′ri-al), a. and n. [< raptori-ous + -al.] I. a. 1. Rapacious; predatory; preying upon animals; of or pertaining to the Raptores or Raptoria.—2. Fitted for seizing and holding; prehensile: as, the raptorial beak or claws of birds; the raptorial palps of insects.—Raptorial legs, in entom., legs in which the tibiæ and tarsi turn back on the femur, often fitting into it like the blade of a pocket-knife into a handle; the tibiæ may also be armed with teeth or spines, thus forming very powerful seizing-organs. This type is found only in the front legs, and it is most fully developed in the Mantidæ. See cut under Mantis.

II. n. A bird of prey; a member of the Raptores.

raptorious (rap-tō′ri-us), a. [< NL. raptorius*, < L. raptor, a robber, plunderer: see raptor.] In entom., same as raptorial. Kirby. [Rare.]

rapture (rap′tūr), n. [< rapt[1] + -ure.] 1†. A violent taking and carrying away; seizure; forcible removal.

Spite of all the rapture of the sea,
This jewel holds his building on my arm.
Shak., Pericles, ii. 1. 161.

When St. Paul had his rapture into heaven, he saw fine things. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 131.

2. Violent transporting movement; a rapid carrying or going along; moving energy.

Wave rolling after wave, where way they found;
If steep, with torrent rapture; if through plain,
Soft ebbing. Milton, P. L., vii. 299.

With the rapture of great winds to blow
About earth's shaken coignes.
Lowell, Agassiz, vi. 1.

3. A state of mental transport or exaltation; ecstasy. (a) Ecstatic pleasure; rapt delight or enjoyment; extreme joy over or gladness on account of something.

I have never heard Praise of love or wine
That panted forth a flood of rapture so divine.
Shelley, To a Skylark.

To exercise a devilish ingenuity in inventions of mutual torture became not only a duty but a rapture.
Motley, Dutch Republic, II. 426.

(b) Ecstatic elevation of thought or feeling; lofty or soaring enthusiasm; exalted or absorbing earnestness.

This man, beyond a Stoick apathy, sees truth as in a rapture, and cleaves to it. Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus

You grow correct that once with rapture writ.
Pope, Epil. to the Satires, i. 3.

There is a rapture on the lonely shore . . .
By the deep sea, and music in its roar.
Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 178.

4. A manifestation of mental transport; an ecstatic utterance or action; an expression of exalted or passionate feeling of any kind; a rhapsody.

Her [Cassandra's] brain-sick raptures
Cannot distaste the goodness of a quarrel
Which hath our several honours all engaged
To make it gracious. Shak., T. and C., ii. 2. 122.

Are not groans and tears
Harmonious raptures in th' Almighty's ears?
Quarles, Emblems, iv. 15.

5†. An ecstasy of passionate excitement; a paroxysm or fit from excessive emotion. [Rare.]

Your prattling nurse
Into a rapture lets her baby cry.
Shak., Cor., ii. 1.•223.

=Syn. 3. Transport, bliss, exaltation.

raptured (rap′tūrd), a. [< rapture + -ed[2].] In a state of rapture; characterized by rapture or ecstasy; enraptured.

Raptur'd I stood, and as this hour amaz'd,
With rev'rence at the lofty wonder gaz'd.
Pope, Odyssey, vi. 199.

The latent Damon drew
Such maddening draughts of beauty to his soul,
As for a while o'erwhelm'd his raptured thought
With luxury too-daring. Thomson, Summer, l. 1333.

That favored strain was Surrey's raptured line.
Scott, L. of L. M., vi. 19.

rapturist (rap′tūr-ist), n. [< rapture + -ist.] One who habitually manifests rapture; an enthusiast. [Rare.]

Such swarms of prophets and rapturists have flown out of those hives in some ages.
J. Spencer, Vanity of Vulgar Prophecies (1665), p. 43.

rapturous (rap′tūr-us), a. [< rapture + -ous.] Of the character of rapture; marked by rapture; exciting or manifesting rapture; ecstatically joyous or exalted: as, rapturous exultation; a rapturous look; a rapturous scene.

His welcome, before enthusiastic, was now rapturous.
Everett, Orations, I. 480.

rapturously (rap′tūr-us-li), adv. In a rapturous manner; with rapture; ecstatically.

raptus melancholicus (rap′tus mel-an-kol′i-kus). [NL.: L. raptus, a seizure; melancholicus, melancholic: see rapt[2], n., and melancholic.] A motor crisis or outbreak of uncontrollable violence developed in a melancholic person from the intensity of his mental anguish.

raquet, n. See racket[2].

raquette (ra-ket′), n. [F.] A racket.—Raquette head-dress, a kind of head-dress in use toward the close of the sixteenth century, in which the hair is drawn back from the forehead and temples, and raised in a sort of crest; a kind of chignon was arranged at the back of the head and covered by a cap of fine linen, darned net embroidery, or some similar material.

rara (rä′rä), n. [S. Amer.; imitative of its cry.] A bird, the South American plant-cutter, Phytotoma rara. Also called rarita. See cut under Phytotoma.

rara avis (rā′rē ā′vis) pl. raræ aves (rā′rē ā′vēz). [L., in full rara avis in terris, 'a rare bird on earth'—a phrase applied by Horace (Sat. ii. 2, 26) to the peacock: rara, fem. of rarus, rare, uncommon; avis, bird: see rare[1] and Aves.] A rare bird; hence, a person or an object of a rare kind or character; a prodigy.

rare[1] (rār), a. [< ME. rare = D. raar = MLG. rār, LG. raar = G. Dan. Sw. rar, < OF. rare, rere, F. rare, dial. raire, rale, rase = Sp. Pg. It. raro, < L. rarus, thin, not dense, thinly scattered, few, rare, uncommon; root unknown.] 1. Thin; porous; not dense; of slight consistence; rarefied; having relatively little matter in a given volume: as, a rare substance; the rare atmosphere of high mountains.

The fiend
O'er bog or steep, through strait, rough, dense, or rare,
With head, hands, wings, or feet pursues his way.
Milton, P. L., ii. 948.

Water is nineteen times lighter, and by consequence nineteen times rarer than gold. Newton, Opticks, II. iii. 8.

2. Thinly scattered; coming or occurring at wide intervals; sparse; dispersed.

Cucumber in this moone is sowen rare.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 110.

The cattle in the fields and meadows green:
Those rare and solitary, these in flocks
Pasturing at once, and in broad herds upsprung.
Milton, P. L., vii. 461.

He left the barren-beaten thoroughfare,
Chose the green path that show'd the rarer foot.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

3. Very uncommon or infrequent; seldom occurring or to be found; hardly ever met with.

She calls me proud, and that she could not love me
Were man as rare as phœnix.
Shak., As you Like it, iv. 3. 17.

It is the rarest thing that ever I saw in any place, neyther do I thinke that any citie of Christendome hath the like. Coryat, Crudities, I. 192.

When so many have written too much, we shall the more readily pardon the rare man who has written too little or just enough. Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 161.

Hence—4. Remarkable from uncommonness; especially, uncommonly good, excellent, valuable, fine, or the like; of an excellence seldom met with.

Good discent, rare features, vertuous partes.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 43.

I think my love as rare
As any she belied with false compare.
Shak., Sonnets, cxxx.

They write to me from England of rare News in France.
Howell, Letters, I. vi. 37.

Ha! ha! ha! yes, yes, I think it a rare joke.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, iii. 3.

She's a rare hand at sausages; there's noane like her in a' the three Ridings. Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, viii.

= Syn. 3. Rare, Scarce, infrequent, unusual. Rare implies that only few of the kind exist: as, perfect diamonds are rare. Scarce properly implies a previous or usual condition of greater abundance. Rare means that there are much fewer of a kind to be found than may be found where scarce would apply.

A perfect union of wit and judgment is one of the rarest things in the world. Burke.

Where words are scarce, they are seldom spent in vain.
Shak., Rich. II., ii. 1. 7.

Then touch'd upon the game, how scarce it was
This season. Tennyson, Audley Court.

4. Singular, extraordinary, incomparable, choice.

rare[2] (rãr), a. [A dial. form of rear[2], q. v.] Not thoroughly cooked; partly cooked; underdone: applied to meat: as, rare beef; a rare chop. [In common use in the United States, but now only dialectal in Great Britain.]

New-laid eggs, which Baucis' busy care Turned by a gentle fire, and roasted rare.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., viii. 98.

Scanty mutton scrags on Fridays, and rather more savoury, but grudging, portions of the same flesh, rotten-roasted or rare, on the Tuesdays. Lamb, Christ's Hospital.

The word rare, applied to meat not cooked enough, did sound really strange to me; but an eminent citizen of yours presently showed me that it had for it the authority of Dryden. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 69.

rare[3] (rãr), adv. [Also rear; prob. a reduction of rather (with sense of the positive rath): see rather, rath[1], adv. Cf. rareripe for rathripe.] Early. [Prov. Eng.]

rare[4] (rãr), v. A dialectal form of rear[1]. [U. S.]

rare[5]†, v. An obsolete form of roar.

rarebit (rãr'bit), n. [An altered form of rabbit[1] in the phrase Welsh rabbit, simulating an absurd derivation from rare[1] + bit, as if 'a rare delicacy.'] See Welsh rabbit, under rabbit[1].

raree-show (rar'ē-shō), n. [A foreign pron. of rare show (Johnson): but poss. for rarity-show* (cf. G. raritäten-kabinet, a 'cabinet of curiosities or rarities,' raritätenkasten, peep-show, D. rare-kykkas, a 'rare show,' show-box).] A peep-show; a show carried about in a box.

Thou didst look into it with as much innocency of heart as ever child look'd into a raree-show box.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, viii. 24.

rarefaction (rar-ē-fak'shon), n. [< F. raréfaction = Pr. rarefaccio = Sp. rarefacción = Pg. rarefacção = It. rarefazione, < L. as if rarefactio(n-)*, < rarefacere, pp. rarefactus, rarefy: see rarefy.] The act or process of rarefying or making rare, or of expanding or distending a body or mass of matter, whereby the bulk is increased, or a smaller number of its particles occupy the same space; also, the state or condition so produced: opposed to condensation. The term is used chiefly in speaking of gases, the terms dilatation and expansion being applied in speaking of solids and liquids. There was formerly a dispute as to whether rarefaction consisted merely of an increase in the mean distance of the particles (as it is now held to do), or in an enlargement of the particles themselves, or finally in an intrusion of foreign particles. In the strictest sense, the word was understood to signify the second action.

Either we must say . . . that the selfsame body does not only obtain a greater space in rarefaction, . . . but adequately and exactly filled it, and so when rarefied acquires larger dimensions without either leaving any vacuities betwixt its component corpuscles or admitting between them any new or extraneous substance whatsoever. Now it is to this last (and, as some call it, rigorous) way of rarefaction that our adversary has recourse.
Boyle, Spring of the Air, I. iii.

When the rarefaction of a gas is extreme (one-millionth) its matter becomes radiant.
A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 584.

rarefactive (rar-ē-fak'tiv), a. [= F. raréfactif = Pr. rarefactiu = Sp. Pg. rarefactivo; as rarefact(ion) + -ive.] Causing rarefaction; making rarer or less dense. [Rare.]

The condition of the bone was not a tumour, but a rarefactive disease of the whole bone accompanied by new growth. Lancet, No. 3423, p. 684.

rarefiable (rar'ē-fī-ą-bl), a. [< rarefy + -able.] Capable of being rarefied.

rarefy (rar'ē-fī), v.; pret. and pp. rarefied, ppr. rarefying. [Also, incorrectly, rarify; < F. raréfier = Pr. rarefficar = Sp. rarificar = It. rarificare, < ML. as if rareficare*, < L. rarefacere (> Pg. rarefazer), make thin or rare, < rarus, thin, rare, + facere, make.] I. trans. To make rare, thin, porous, or less dense; expand or enlarge without adding any new matter; figuratively, to spread or stretch out; distend: opposed to condense.

Presently the water, very much rarified like a mist, began to rise. Court and Times of Charles I., I. 113.

For plain truths lose much of their weight when they are rarify'd into subtillities. Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. iv.

A body is commonly said to be rarefied or dilated (for I take the word in a larger sense than I know many others do) . . . when it acquires greater dimensions than the same body had before. Boyle, Works, I. 144.

Rarefying osteitis, an osteitis in which the Haversian canals become enlarged and the bone rarefied. Also called osteoporosis.

II. intrans. To become rare; pass into a thinner or less dense condition.

Earth rarefies to dew; expanded more, rarely[1] (rãr'li), adv. [< rare[1], a., + -ly[2].] 1. Seldom; not often: as, things rarely seen.
The subtil dew in air begins to soar. Dryden.

His friend alwayes shall doe best, and you shall rarely heare good of his enemy.
Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, A Partiall Man.

The good we never miss we rarely prize.
Cowper, Retirement, l. 406.

2. Finely; excellently; remarkably well; with a rare excellence.

I could play Ercles rarely, or a part to tear a cat in, to make all split. Shak., M. N. D., i. 2. 31.

Argyll has raised an hunder men,
An hunder harness'd rarely.
Bonnie House of Airly (Child's Ballads, VI. 186).

You can write rarely now, after all your schooling, I should think. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, iii. 3.

3. In excellent health: in quasi-adjective use. Compare purely in like use. [Prov. Eng. and U. S.]

rarely[2] (rãr'li), adv. [< rare[2], a., + -ly[2].] So as to be underdone or only partially cooked: said of meats: as, a roast of beef rarely cooked.

rareness[1] (rãr'nes), n. [< rare[1], a., + -ness.] 1. Thinness; tenuity; rarity: as, the rareness of air or vapor.—2. The state of being scarce, or of happening seldom; uncommonness; infrequency.

If that the follye of men hadde not sette it [gold] in higher estimation for the rarenesse sake.
Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ii. 6.

Rareness and difficulty give estimation
To all things are i' th' world.
Webster, Devil's Law-Case, v. 6.

3. Uncommon character or quality; especially, unusual excellence, fineness, or the like. [Rare.]

Roses set in the midst of a pool, being supported by some stay; which is matter of rareness and pleasure, though of small use. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 407.

His providences toward us are to be admired for the rareness and graciousness of them. Sharp, Sermons, II. i.

rareness[2] (rãr'nes), n. [< rare[2], a., + -ness.] The state of being rare or underdone in cooking.

rareripe (rãr'rip), a. and n. [A reduction of rathripe, q. v.] I. a. Early ripe; ripe before others, or before the usual season: as, rareripe peaches.

II. n. An early fruit, particularly a kind of peach which ripens early.

rarify (rar'i-fī), v.; pret. and pp. rarified, ppr. rarifying. A common but incorrect spelling of rarefy.

rarita (rä-rē'tä), n. [S. Amer.] Same as rara.

rarity (rar'i-ti), n.; pl. rarities (-tiz). [= OF. rarité, rareté = Pr. raritat, raretat = Sp. raridad = Pg. raridade = It. rarità = D. rariteit = G. rarität = Dan. Sw. raritet, < L. rarita(t-)s, the state of being thin or not dense, looseness of texture, tenuity, also fewness, rarity, a rare or curious thing, esp. in pl., < rarus, thin, rare: see rare[1].] 1. The condition of being rare, or not dense, or of occupying, as a corporeal substance, much space with little matter; thinness; tenuity: opposed to density: as, the rarity of a gas.

This I do . . . only that I may better demonstrate the great rarity and tenuity of their imaginary chaos.
Bentley, Sermons.

A few birds . . . seemed to swim in an atmosphere of more than usual rarity.
R. L. Stevenson, Treasure of Franchard.

Dryden, Tyrannic Love, Prol., l. 21.

2. A rash act; a reckless or foolhardy deed.

Why not set forth, if I should do
This rashness, that which might ensue
With this old soul in organs new?
Tennyson, Two Voices.

=Syn. 1. Rashness, Temerity. Rashness has the vigor of the Anglo-Saxon, temerity the selectness and dignity of the Latin. Temerity implies personal danger, physical or other: as, the temerity of undertaking to contradict Samuel Johnson; temerity in going upon thin ice. Rashness is broader in this respect. Rashness goes by the feelings without the judgment; temerity rather disregards the judgment. Temerity refers rather to the disposition, rashness to the conduct. See adventurous.

For rashness is not courage. Rashness flings itself into danger without consideration or foresight. But courage counts the cost, and does not make any display of itself.
J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 336.

As the note of warlike preparation reached them [the Moors] in their fastnesses, they felt their temerity in thus bringing the whole weight of the Castilian monarchy on their heads. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 7.

Rasores (rā-sō'rēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. rasor, a scraper (applied to a fiddler), < radere, pp. rasus, scrape, scratch: see rase[1], raze[1].] 1†. In Illiger's system (1811), the rasorial birds, or scratchers, an order of Aves, including the gallinaceous and columbaceous birds.—2. The same excluding the pigeons: now usually called Gallinæ (which see).

Rasores.
1, 1, head and foot of dunghill-cock; 2, 2, head and foot of moor-fowl (Lagopus scoticus).

rasorial (rā-sō'ri-al), a. [NL., < Rasores + -ial.] Given to scratching the ground for food, as poultry; belonging to the Rasores, especially in the second sense of that word; gallinaceous.

rasp[1] (rąsp), v. [< ME. raspen, rospen, < OF. rasper, F. râper, scrape, grate, rasp, = Sp. Pg. raspar = It. raspare, scrape, rasp, < ML. raspare, scrape, rake, < OHG. raspōn, MHG. raspen, scrape together (cf. D. MLG. raspen = MHG. freq. raspelen, G. raspeln, rasp, = Dan. raspe = Sw. raspa, rasp, in part from the noun); cf. OHG. hrespan, MHG. respen, rake together, pluck; Icel. rispa, scratch (> Sc. risp); prob. from the root of OHG. raffon*, MHG. G. raffen, etc., seize: see rap[2]. Cf. rasp[1], n. Hence ult. (prob.) rapier.] I. trans. 1. To abrade by rubbing or grating with a coarsely rough instrument; grate, or grate away, with a rasp or something comparable to it.

Al that thise first vii [years of plenty] maken, Sulen this othere vii [years of famine] rospen & raken.
Genesis and Exodus (E. E. T. S.), l. 2132.

That fellow . . . who insists that the shoe must fit him because it fitted his father and grandfather, and that, if his foot will not enter, he will pare and rasp it.
Landor, Imaginary Conversations, Solon and Pisistratus.

When the cane [in sugar-making] has been rasped to shreds [by a rasper], it is reduced to pulp by disintegrating apparatus. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., II. 1879.

2. Figuratively, to affect or perform harshly, as if by the use of a rasp; grate upon; utter with a rough and jarring effect: as, to rasp one's feelings; to rasp out a refusal.

Through all the weird September-eves
I heard the harsh, reiterant katydids
Rasp the mysterious silence.
J. G. Holland, Kathrina, i.

Grating songs a listening crowd endures,
Rasped from the throats of bellowing amateurs.
O. W. Holmes, An After-Dinner Poem.

II. intrans. To rub against something gratingly; produce a rasping effect: as, the vessel rasped against the quay: literally or figuratively.

Rasped harshly against his dainty nature.
Lowell, Vision of Sir Launfal, i. 5.

rasp[1] (rąsp), n. [= D. Dan. Sw. rasp = G. raspe, < OF. raspe, F. râpe (> G. rappe) (= It. raspa), a rasp, grater, < rasper, F. râper, grate, rasp, file: see rasp[1], v.] 1. A coarse form of file, having its surface dotted with separate protruding teeth, formed by the indentations of a pointed punch. While the rasp is essentially a file it is customary to distinguish between rasps and files. Files are cut with a chisel, the surface being raised into ridges, while rasps have individual teeth. Rasps are classified according to length, section, and fineness of cut, and are made in many styles, as horse-, cabinet-, wood-, shoe-rasp, etc. See file.

The horses from the country were a goodly sight to see, with the rasp of winter bristles rising through and among the soft summer-coat.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, lxix.

2. A machine or large instrument for use in rasping; a rasper.

The juice [of beet-roots] from the rasp and the press is brought into a boiler and heated by steam.
Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 210.

3. The radula or odontophore of a mollusk; the lingual ribbon. See cut under radula.—4. A rasping surface. (a†) The steel of a tinder-box. [Prov. Eng.] (b) The rough surface of the tongue of some animals.

He dismounted when he came to the cattle, and walked among them, stroking their soft flanks, and feeling in the palm of his hand the rasp of their tongues.
The Century, XXXV. 947.

rasp[2] (rąsp), n. [Formerly also respe, also raspis, raspise, raspice, respass (with occasional pl. raspises), appar. orig. pl., prop. raspes (the berries), used as sing. (the bush, and later transferred to a single berry ?), prob. < rasp[1], n., or abbr. of raspberry, < rasp[1] + berry[1], with ref. to its rough outside; cf. It. raspo, a raspberry (Florio): see rasp[1].] The fruit of the common (European) raspberry. See raspberry. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

The soyle of this playne bryngeth foorth ferne and bramble bussbes bearynge blacke berries or wylde raspes, which two are tokens of coulde regions.
Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber, p. 172).

For kindes of fruites, they haue . . . rasps, strawberies, and hurtilberies. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 477.

Rosey had done eating up her pine-apple, artlessly confessing . . . that she preferred it to the rasps and hinny-blobs in her grandmamma's garden.
Thackeray, Newcomes, xxiii.

rasp[3] (rąsp), v. i. [Cf. G. räuspern, hawk or clear the throat; prob. imitative.] To belch; eject wind from the stomach. [Old and prov. Eng.]

Let them bind gold to their aching head, drink Cleopatra's draught (precious stones dissolved), to ease their rasping stomach. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 424.

This man of nice education hath a feeble stomacke, and (rasping since his last meale) doubts whether he should eat of his laste meale or nothing.
Bp. Hall, Heaven upon Earth, § 26.

raspatory (ras'pa-tō-ri), n.; pl. raspatories (-riz). [< ML. raspatorium (cf. Sp. Pg. raspador, a scraper), < raspare, rasp, scrape: see rasp[1], v.] A surgeons' rasp; an instrument for scraping or abrading bones in surgical or anatomical ★operations.

raspberry (rąz'ber″i), n.; pl. raspberries (-iz). [Formerly also rasberry and raspis-berry; < rasp[1], or rasp[2] (see rasp[2]), + berry[1].] 1. The fruit of several plants of the genus Rubus, consisting of many small juicy grains or drupes, which, unlike those of the blackberry, separate from the convex receptacle together when ripe, thus giving the fruit the shape of a thimble. Besides its extensive use as a dessert fruit, the raspberry is used for jellies and jam, and its juice for flavoring, for cooling drinks, and in wines and brandies.

Herewith (at hand) taking her horne of plentie,
Fill'd with the choyse of every orchard's daintie,
As peares, plums, apples, the sweet raspis-berry.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, i. 5.

2. The plant that produces this berry. The common garden raspberry, the first of the name, is Rubus Idæus, a native of Europe and Asiatic Russia—a shrub with perennial creeping rootstock, nearly erect, prickly, biennial stems, and a red pleasant fruit. It was cultivated by the Romans in the fourth century, and is the source of the best raspberries, affording many varieties, some of them yellow-fruited. The wild red raspberry, R. strigosus, of North America, is a very similar plant, but not quite so tall, the leaves being thinner, and the fruit not so firm, large, or well-flavored. It is common northward, especially on newly cleared grounds, and its fruit is much gathered; while under cultivation it has yielded several good varieties. The black raspberry, thimbleberry, or blackcap is the American R. occidentalis, a shrub with long recurved biennial stems, rooting at the tips, and a black fruit. It is very productive with little care, and affords good garden varieties.—Dwarf raspberry, an unimportant American species, Rubus Americanus, with herbaceous trailing or ascending stems, resembling a blackberry.—Flowering raspberry, a name of two American species, Rubus odoratus, the purple, and R. parviflorus, the white flowering raspberry. The former is a rather ornamental shrub of the eastern United States, with ample 3- to 5-lobed leaves, and showy purple or pink flowers blooming all summer, the fruit of little worth. In England it is sometimes called Virginian raspberry. R. parviflorus is a similar western species with white flowers; also, and better, called salmon-berry.—Himalayan raspberry, Rubus rosæfolius, an East Indian species widely naturalized and cultivated in warm countries, and often grown as a greenhouse shrub, on account of its profusion of white, often double, flowers. The large fruit consists of many minute orange-red grains.—Raspberry vinegar, a drink made with sugar, vinegar, and the juice of raspberries.—Virginian raspberry. See flowering raspberry.

★raspberry-borer (rȧz′ber-i-bōr″ėr), n. The larva of one of the clear-winged sphinxes or hornet-moths, Bembecia marginata, common in the United States. It bores the roots of raspberries and blackberries. The larva of a beetle, Oberea bimaculata, which also bores into the same plants, is often called by this name.

Raspberry-borer (Bembecia marginata).
a, male; b, female. (Natural size.)

raspberry-bush (rȧz′ber-i-bu̇sh), n. The shrub, bush, or bramble producing any of the kinds of raspberry.

raspberry-jam tree (rȧz′ber-i-jam trē). One of the Australian wattle-trees, Acacia acuminata. Its wood is used in cabinet-work, and has the odor of jam made from raspberries.

rasped (rȧspt), a. [Pp. of rasp[1], v.] 1. Affected as if by rasping; hoarse or raucous, as the voice; raspy; nervous or irritable, as from continued slight provocations.—2. In bookbinding, said of book-covers which have the sharp angles taken off, but are not beveled.

rasper (rȧs′pėr), n. [< rasp[1] + -er[1].] 1. One who or that which rasps; a cutting scraper. Specifically—(a) A coarse file for removing the burnt crust from over-baked bread. (b) A rasping-machine; an instrument for rasping sugar-cane, beet-root, or the like to shreds; a large grater.

The typical representative of the internal system of grating is Champonnois' rasper.
Spons' Encyc. Manuf., II. 1838.

2. In hunting, a difficult fence. [Colloq.]

Three fourths of our fences . . . average somewhat better than four feet in height, with an occasional rasper that will come well up to five. The Century, XXXII. 336.

3. A contrivance for taking fish, consisting of several bare hooks fastened back to back, to be jerked through the water with a line; a pull-devil. [Canada.]

rasp-house (rȧsp′hous), n. A house of correction (in Holland, etc.) in which the prisoners were employed in rasping wood. N. E. D.

We went to see the Rasp-house, where the lusty knaves are compell'd to worke, and the rasping of Brasill and Logwood is very hard labour.
Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 19, 1641.

raspice†, n. Same as rasp[2].

rasping (rȧs′ping), n. [Verbal n. of rasp[1], v.] A particle rasped off from a body or mass of matter. Compare filing[1], 2.

The wood itself, either reduced to shavings, raspings, or powder. W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico-printing, p. 337.

rasping (rȧs′ping), p. a. [Ppr. of rasp[1], v.] 1. Characterized by grating or scraping: as, a rasping sound; hence, irritating; exasperating. —2. In hunting, said of a fence difficult to take.

You cannot . . . make him keep his seat over a rasping fence. Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 3d ser., p. 60.

raspingly (rȧs′ping-li), adv. With a harsh, rasping sound or effect; in a coarse, harsh manner; gratingly; irritatingly; exasperatingly.

I told him to stay at home, quite raspingly, and he was very ready to admit that I had done him a good turn in doing so. F. H. Burnett, Pretty Polly Pemberton, vii.

rasping-machine (rȧs′ping-ma-shēn″), n. 1. A machine for rasping wood and bark for making dyes, tinctures, etc.; a bark-cutting machine. —2. A machine for grating beet-root, for making sugar. E. H. Knight.

rasping-mill (rȧs′ping-mil), n. A saw-like machine for reducing a substance to shreds or fine particles, as a bark-cutter or a grinding-mill for beet-roots; a rasping-machine; a rasper.

raspis†, n. Same as rasp[2].

The raspis is planted in gardens. Gerard.

Raspis are of the same vertue that common brier or bramble is of. It were good to keepe some of the juyce of raspis-berries in some wooden vessel, and to make it, as it were, raspis wine. Langham, Garden of Health, p. 522.

rasp-palm (rȧsp′pȧm), n. A common palm of the Amazon region, Iriartea exorrhiza, notable in that its stem is supported by a cone of aërial roots, of sufficient height for a man to pass beneath. These roots are covered with hard tubercles, and are used by the natives as graters, whence the name.

rasp-pod (rȧsp′pod), n. An Australian tree, Flindersia australis: so named from its woody capsules, covered with tubercles and used as graters.

rasp-punch (rȧsp′punch), n. A tool, rather more like a cold-chisel than a punch, used for forming the teeth of rasps by cutting into, and turning upward above the surface, parts of the metal before it has been hardened and tempered.

raspy (rȧs′pi), a. [< rasp[1] + -y[1].] Grating; harsh; rough.

Such a raspy, untamed voice as that of his I have hardly heard. Carlyle, Misc., IV. 197. (Davies.) rasse[1] (ras), n. [< Javanese rase, smell, taste, < Skt. rasa, sap, taste, savor.] A kind of civet-cat; the lesser civet, a viverrine quadruped of the genus Viverricula, V. malaccensis, widely distributed in China, India, the Malay peninsula, Java, etc. It is about 20 inches long without the tail, and is sometimes called the Malacca weasel. Its perfume, called by the natives dedes, is secreted in a double pouch like that of the civet; it is much valued by the Javanese. For its sake the animal is often kept in captivity. It is savage and irritable, and can inflict a very severe bite.

rasse[2]†, n. [ME.] An eminence; a mound; a summit.

On a rasse of a rok hit reste at the laste,
On the mounte of Mararach of Armene hilles.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 446.

rastral (ras′tral), n. [< rastrum + -al.] Same as rastrum.

rastrite (ras′trīt), n. A zoöphyte of the genus Rastrites; a graptolite.

Rastrites (ras-trī′tēz), n. [NL., < L. rastrum, a rake, + -ites.] A genus of Silurian graptolites.

rastrum (ras′trum), n.; pl. rastra (-trä). [NL., < L. rastrum, a rake, hoe, mattock, < radere, scrape: see rase[1].] 1. A five-pointed pen for ruling staffs for music; a music-pen.—2. A herse.

rasure (rā′zu̇r), n. [Early mod. E. also razure; < F. rasure = Sp. Pg. It. rasura, a shaving, a blotting off, also the priest's tonsure, < L. rasura, a shaving, scraping, < radere, pp. rasus, scrape: see rase[1]. Cf. erasure.] 1. The act of scraping or shaving; a rasing or erasing; a scratch. [Rare.]

With the tooth of a small beast like a rat they race some their faces, some their bodies, after diuers formes, as if it were with the scratch of a pin, the print of which rasure can neuer be done away againe during life.
Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 674.

A forted residence 'gainst the tooth of time
And razure of oblivion. Shak., M. for M., v. 1. 13.

2†. Same as erasure.

There were many razures in the book of the treasury.
Bp. Burnet.

★rat[1] (rat), n. [Formerly also ratt; < ME. ratte, rotte, pl. rattes, < AS. ræt (rætt-) = MD. ratte, D. rat = OLG. ratta, MLG. ratte, LG. ratte, also rat, rot = OHG. ratto, m., ratta, f., MHG. rat, rate, m., ratte, rate, f., MHG. also ratz, ratze, G. ratze, m., = Icel. rotta = Sw. råtta = Dan. rotte, a rat; cf. F. Pr. rat = Sp. Pg. rato = It. ratto = ML. ratus, rattus; cf. also Ir. Gael. radan, Bret. raz, a rat. The relations of the Teut., Rom., and Celtic groups to one another, and the ult. source of the word, are unknown. Some refer the word to the root seen in L. radere, scratch, scrape (see rase[1], raze[1]), rodere, gnaw (see rodent). The forms of the word cat are equally wide-spread.] 1. A rodent of some of the larger species of the genus Mus, as M. rattus, the black rat, and M. decumanus, the gray, brown, or Norway rat: distinguished from mouse. The distinction between rat and mouse, in the application of the names to animals everywhere parasitic with man, is obvious and familiar. But these are simply larger and smaller species of the same genus, very closely related zoölogically, and in the application of the two names to the many other species of the same genus all distinction between them is lost.

2. Any rodent of the family Muridæ; a murine; in the plural, the Muridæ. In this sense, rat includes mouse. American rats or mice, as a particular section of the Murinæ, were called Sigmodontes by Coues; but this group has not been accepted. Field-rats, water-rats, meadow-mice, or voles are Muridæ of the subfamily Microtinæ. See cuts under Arvicola, Muridæ, muskrat, Neotoma, Nesokia, and Nesomys.

3. Any rodent of the suborder Myomorpha. Different animals of several families, as Dipodidæ, Zapodidæ, Saccomyidæ, Geomyidæ, Spalacidæ, are often known as rats of some kind distinguished by qualifying words or compound names. See cut under mole-rat.

4. Some other rodent, or some insectivore, marsupial, or other animal like or likened to a rat. Thus, among hystricomorphic rodents, many species of Octodontidæ are called rats: as, the spiny rats of the subfamily Echinomyinæ. Some large aquatic shrews are known as muskrats. (See Myogale.) Some rat-like marsupials are known as kangaroo-rats. (See bettong, and cuts under kangaroo-rat and Echimys.)

5. A person who is considered to act in some respect in a manner characteristic of rats: so called in opprobrium. Specifically—(a) A man who deserts a party or an association of any kind for one opposed to it in order to gain some personal advantage or benefit; a self-seeking turncoat; a renegade. [Colloq.]

He [Wentworth] was the first of the Rats, the first of those statesmen whose patriotism had been only the coquetry of a political prostitution, and whose profligacy has taught governments to adopt the old maxim of the slave-market, that it is cheaper to buy than to breed, to import defenders from an Opposition than to rear them in a Ministry. Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

(b) A workman who accepts lower wages than those current at the time and place or required by an authorized scale, or one who takes a position vacated by a striker, or one who refuses to strike when others do. [Colloq.]

The men who agree to go into the strike are always the more united and determined class. The rats who refuse suffer accordingly. The American, III. 181.

(c†) A clergyman: so called in contempt. Halliwell.

6. Something suggesting the idea of a rat, as a curving roll of stuffed cloth or of crimped hair-work, with tapering ends, formerly (about 1860–70) and still occasionally used by women to puff out the hair, which was turned over it.

At one time even a small amount of natural hair easily served the purpose of covering the crescent-shaped pillows on which it was put up, the startling names of which were rats and mice. The Century, XXXVI. 769.

Alexandrian rat, a gray or rufous-backed and white-bellied relative of Mus rattus, to which the name M. alexandrinus has been applied, owing to its having been first discovered at Alexandria in Egypt, and considered specifically distinct from the black rat.—Bamboo-rat, an Indian murine rodent mammal of the genus Rhizomys, as R. sumatranus. The bay bamboo-rat is R. badius. The species are also called canets. See cut under Rhizomys.—Bandicoot rat. (a) The Anglo-Indian name of the large murine rodents of India, of the family Muridæ, subfamily Phlœomyinæ, and genus Nesokia, of which there are several species, all Indian. N. grifithi is an example. See cut under Nesokia. (b) Same as bandicoot, 2.—Black rat, Mus rattus, one of the most anciently known rats, now almost cosmopolitan, and typically of a blackish color, but very variable in this respect. It is rather smaller than the Norway gray rat. In one of its varieties it is known as roof-rat (Mus tectorum) and white-bellied rat. See cut under Muridæ.—Hare-tailed rat. See lemming.—Maori rat, the black rat, Mus rattus, introduced and naturalized in New Zealand.—Mountain rat, the large bushy-tailed wood-rat of the Rocky Mountain region, Neotoma cinerea; the pack-rat. [U. S.]—Norway rat, the common rat, Mus decumanus.—Pack-rat, the mountain rat, Neotoma cinerea: so called on account of its curious and inveterate habit of dragging off to its hole any object it can move. [Western U. S.]—Pharaonic rat, Pharaoh's rat, the ichneumon: a phrase traceable back at least to Belon (about 1555). See Herpestes. Also called Pharaoh's mouse.—Pouched rat. See pouched.—To have a rat in the garret, to be slightly crack-brained: same as to have a bee in one's bonnet (which see, under bee).—To smell a rat, to be suspicious that all is not right; have an inkling of some mischief, plot, or underhand proceeding.

Quoth Hudibras, "I smell a rat:
Ralpho, thou dost prevaricate."
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. i. 821.

rat[1] (rat), v.; pret. and pp. ratted, ppr. ratting. [< rat[1], n.] I. intrans. 1. To catch or kill rats; follow the business of a ratter or rat-catcher. —2. To go over from one party or cause to another, especially from a party or cause that is losing or likely to lose, as rats run from a falling house; desert one's party or associates for advantage or gain; become a renegade. [Colloq.]

His ci-devant friends curse the hour that he ratted.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 385.

I am fully resolved to oppose several of the clauses. But to declare my intention publicly, at a moment when the Government is in danger, would have the appearance of ratting. Macaulay, in Trevelyan, I. 275.

3. To work for less than current wages, to refuse to strike with fellow-workmen, or to take the place of one who has struck: often with indefinite it. See rat[1], n., 5 (b). [Colloq.]

II. trans. 1. To puff out (the hair) by means of a rat. See rat[1], n., 6. [Rare.]

Next morning, at breakfast, Sin Saxon was as beautifully ruffled, ratted, and crimped—as gay, as bewitching, and defiant—as ever. Mrs. Whitney, Leslie Goldthwaite, x.

2. To displace or supplant union workers in: as, to rat an office or a shop. [Colloq.]

rat[2]† (rat), n. [Usually in pl. rats, < ME. rattes, rags; either from the verb, ME. ratten, tear (see rat[2], v.), or < Icel. hrat, hrati, rubbish, trash, = Norw. rat, rubbish; cf. Sw. Norw. rata, reject, refuse (see rate[1]).] A rag; tatter. [Prov. Eng.]

I rattes and i clutes. Old Eng. Homilies, I. 227.

rat[2]† (rat), v. t. [< ME. ratten = MHG. ratzen, tear; cf. rat[2], n.] To tear.

How watȝ thou hardy this hous for thyn vnhap [to] neȝe,
In on so ratted & rent at the sydes?
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 144.

rat[3] (rat), v. t. [Prob. a var. of rot; cf. drat[2], in similar use.] A term of objurgation, used in the imperative.

rat[4]†. A Middle English contracted form of redeth, the third person singular present indicative of read[1]. Piers Plowman.

rata (rä′tä), n. [Maori rata.] A tree of New Zealand, Metrosideros robusta, growing from 60 to 80 feet high, the wood of which is used in cabinet-work, and in civil and naval architecture. The name belongs also to M. florida, a stout-trunked climber ascending the highest trees; it is also more or less extended by settlers to other species of the genus. Besides in several cases yielding valuable wood, these trees are notable for their profusion of brilliant flowers, which are generally, as in M. robusta, scarlet. See Metrosideros.

ratability (rā-ta-bil′i-ti), n. [< ratable + -ity (see -bility).] The quality of being ratable. Athenæum, No. 3261, p. 535.

ratable (rā′ta-bl), a. [Also rateable; < rate[2] + -able.] 1. Capable of being rated, or set at a certain value.

I collect out of the abbay booke of Burton, that 20 Orœ were ratable to two markes of siluer.
Camden, Remains, Money.

2. Reckoned according to a certain rate; proportional.

In conscience and credit [poets were] bound, next after the diuine praises of the immortall gods, to yeeld a like ratable honour to all such amongst men as most resembled the gods by excellencie of function.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 28.

A ratable payment of all the debts of the deceased, in equal degree, is clearly the most equitable method.
Blackstone, Com., III. ii.

3. Liable or subjected by law to be rated or assessed for taxation.

ratableness (rā′ta-bl-nes), n. Ratability.

ratably (rā′ta-blī), adv. According to rating or valuation; at a proportionate rate; proportionally.

I will thus charge them all ratablye, according to theyr abilityes, towardes theyr maintenaunce.
Spenser, State of Ireland.

The shareholders of every national banking association shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably.
National Bank Act, U. S. (ed. 1882), p. 14.

★ratafia (rat-a-fē′ä), n. [Formerly also ratifia, ratifie, ratifée, also ratafiaz; = D., etc., ratafia, < F. ratafia, formerly also ratafiat (cf. F. tafia, rum, arrack), = Sp. ratafía = Pg. ratafia, < Malay araq, a distilled spirit, arrack (< Ar. 'araq, juice, distilled spirit: see arrack), + tafia, taffia, a spirit distilled from molasses.] 1. A sweet cordial flavored with fruits: sometimes limited to those the flavor of which is obtained from black currants, bitter almonds, or peach- and cherry-kernels.

It would make a Man smile to behold her Figure in a front Box, where her twinkling Eyes, by her Afternoon's Drams of Ratifee and cold Tea, sparkle more than her Pendants. Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of [Queen Anne, I. 201.

2. A kind of fancy cake or biscuit.

Give him three ratafias, soaked in a dessert-spoonful of cream. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vi. 1.

ratan, rattan[2] (ra-tan′), n. [Formerly also rattoon, rotan, rotang, rottang; = D. Sw. Dan. rotting (NL. Rotang), < F. rotin, rotang = Sp. rota, < Malay rotan, ratan. The E. accent, on the last syllable, is appar. in imitation of the F.; the Malay word is accented on the first syllable.] 1. A palm of one among numerous species, mostly of the genus Calamus, a few of the genus Rhapis; a ratan-palm. The species of Calamus are prevailingly climbing palms, attaining a length sometimes of 500 feet, with a thickness not exceeding an inch—ascending the tallest trees, falling in festoons, and again ascending. A few species are found in Africa and Australia, but they abound chiefly in the East Indies, on the mainland and islands. The species of Rhapis are erect slender canes growing in dense tufts, mainly natives of China and Japan. Ratans of this habit are commercially distinguished from the climbing ones as ground-ratans.

2. The stems of the ratan collectively as an economic material. Among its chief commercial sources are Calamus Rotang, C. rudentum, C. verus, C. erectus, and C. Royleanus. The most valuable ratan is produced in Borneo. On account of its length and light, tough, flexible, and fissile character, ratan is applied to very numerous uses. In native regions the product of C. rudentum and other species is split and twisted in vast quantities into all sizes of cordage from cables to fishing-lines. Basket-making is another common use. In some places the stems of climbing ratans are used for the suspension of foot-bridges of great length. In China whole houses are made of ratan, there afforded chiefly by Rhapis flabelliformis. Matting made of split ratan is exported thence to all parts of the world. The same fiber serves also to make hats, the bottoms of rice-sieves, thread for sewing palm-leaves, etc. In recent times ratan has become an important article in western commerce. It is now not only used for walking-sticks, but extensively made into chairs and chair-bottoms, bodies for fancy carriages, fine and coarse basket-work, etc. It has almost superseded willow in making the large baskets required in manufacturing and other industries.

3. A switch or stick of ratan, especially a walking-stick.

Mr. Humley did give me a little black rattoon, painted and gilt. Pepys, Diary, an. 1660.

ratan, rattan[2] (ra-tan′), v. t. [< ratan, rattan[2], n.] 1. To use ratan in making; cover or form with interlaced lengths of ratan.

The second class coach is finished in native ash with Moorish designed ceilings, rattaned sofa seats, and closet and toilet rooms. Sci. Amer., N. S., LIX. 3.

2. To use a ratan upon; beat with or as with a ratan-cane. [Colloq.]

ratan-cane (ra-tan′kān), n. Same as ratan, 3.

ratanhine (rat′an-in), n. [< Braz. Pg. ratanhia (see ratany) + -ine[2].] An alkaloid ($C_{10}H_{13}NO_3$) occurring in small quantity in the extract of ratany-root.

ratany (rat′a-ni), n. [Also rattany, ratanhy, and rhatany; < Sp. ratania = F. ratanhia = Braz. Pg. ratanhia, < Quichua rataña.] 1. A procumbent South American shrub, Krameria triandra, yielding a medicinal root. Its foliage is silver-gray with silky hairs, and it bears star-like lake-colored flowers singly in the upper axils. See Krameria and ratany-root.

Ratany (Krameria triandra).

2. A medicinal substance procured from this plant: same as ratany-root. — Pará, Brazilian, or Ceara ratany, a substitute for the true ratany, obtained from Krameria argentea of northeastern Brazil.

ratany-root (rat′a-ni-röt), n. The root-substance of the ratany, used in medicine for its astringent, diuretic, and detergent properties, and in the adulteration of port-wine.

rataplan (rat-a-plon′), n. [F.; imitative. Cf. rattan[3], rat-a-tat.] The sound or music of the military drum; a tattoo or "rub-a-dub."

rat-a-tat (rat′a-tat′), n. [Imitative. Cf. rat-tat, rat-tat-too.] A rattling sound or effect, as from the beating of a drum.

rat-catcher (rat′kach″ėr), n. One whose business is the catching of rats; a ratter.

rat-catching (rat′kach″ing), n. The catching of rats, now pursued as a business by rat-catchers, and formerly to a large extent in Great Britain, with dogs or ferrets, as a popular amusement.

★ratch[1] (rach), v. [An assibilated form of rack[1], or in part a var. of retch[1] or reach[1]: see rack[1], v.] I. trans. 1. To stretch or pull asunder.—2. To spot or streak. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng. in both uses.]

II. intrans. Naut., to make a stretch or varying stretches in sailing; sail by the wind or by tacks; stand off and on.

There was a fleet of smacks ratching to the eastward on our port bow. W. C. Russell, Jack's Courtship, xxiii.

ratch[1] (rach), n. [An assibilated form of rack[1]: see rack[1], n. In defs. 3 and 4, directly from the verb. Cf. dim. ratchet.] 1. In a machine, a bar having angular teeth, into which a pawl drops, to prevent the machine from being reversed in motion. A circular ratch is a ratchet-wheel.—2. In clockwork, a sort of wheel having fangs, which serve to lift the detents and thereby cause the clock to strike.—3. A straight line. [Prov. Eng.]—4. A white mark on the face of a horse. [Eng.]

ratch[2]† (rach), n. [Early mod. E. also rach, rache; < ME. racche, rache, < AS. ræcc, a dog, = Icel. rakki, a dog.] A dog that hunts by scent.

As they ryde talkynge,
A rach ther come flyngynge Overtwert the way.
Thanne seyde old and yonge,
From her first gynnynge,
They ne sawe honde never so gay.
Lybeaus Disconus (Ritson's Metr. Rom., II.).

There are in England and Scotland two kinds of hunting dogs: the first is called a rache; and this is a foot-scenting creature, both of wild beasts, birds, and fishes also which lie hid among the rocks; the female hereof is called in England a brache. Gentleman's Recreation, p. 28.

ratch[3] (rach), v. t. Same as rash[3]. [Scotch.]

ratch[4] (rach), n. [Origin obscure. Cf. ratchel.] A subsoil of stone and gravel mixed with clay. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

ratched (racht), p. a. [Pp. of ratch[3], v.] Ragged; in a ruinous state. Jamieson. [Scotch.]

ratchel (rach′el), n. [Also ratchell, ratchil; cf. ratch[4], ratcher. Perhaps < G. rutschel, the fragments from two masses of rock sliding one on the other, < rutschen, slide, slip.] Fragments of stone; gravelly stone; also, a hard, rocky crust below the soil. Jamieson. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

ratcher (rach′ėr), n. [Cf. ratch[4], ratchel.] A ★rock. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

ratchet (rach′et), n. [< ratch[1] + -et.] A detent or pivoted piece designed to fit into the teeth of a ratchet-wheel, permitting the wheel to rotate in one direction, but not in the other. A similar device so arranged as to move the wheel is termed a pallet. (See ratchet-wheel, click[1], 3, pawl, and detent.) Combined with the ratchet-wheel as a means of converting a reciprocating into a rotary motion, the ratchet appears in a number of tools and gives its name to each: as, the ratchet bed-key, etc.

ratchet-brace (rach′et-brās), n. See brace[1].

ratchet-burner (rach′et-bėr″nėr), n. A burner for a lamp in which the wick is moved up and down by means of a wheel with notched points.

ratchet-coupling (rach′et-kup″ling), n. A device for uncoupling machinery in the event of a sudden stoppage of the motion of a driving-wheel, as by an obstruction. It consists of a ratchet-wheel inserted in a sleeve on the exterior shaft of a driving-wheel. The ratchet is efficient as long as it transmits the initial motion; but if the revolution of the driver is checked, the sleeve slips over the ratchet until the machinery loses its momentum, thus avoiding a shock.

ratchet-drill (rach′et-dril), n. A tool for drilling holes by means of a ratchet in a narrow plane where there is no room for the common brace.

ratchet-jack (rach′et-jak), n. A screw-jack in which the lever-socket is fitted with a pawl or dog engaging a ratchet-wheel, so that the jack may be operated by oscillation of the lever.

ratchet-lever (rach′et-lev″ėr), n. A lever with a collar fitted around a ratchet-wheel which engages a pawl or dog on the lever, used for operating a drill or screw by oscillation of the lever.

ratchet-pedal (rach′et-ped″al), n. See pedal.

ratchet-post (rach′et-pōst), n. Milit., a metallic post fastened to the rear transom of the top-carriage of a heavy gun, to serve as a support or fulcrum for the elevating-bar.

ratchet-punch (rach′et-punch), n. A punch worked by a screw which is revolved by means of a ratchet-lever.

ratchet-wheel (rach′et-hwēl), n. A wheel with pointed and angular teeth, against which a ratchet abuts, used either for converting a reciprocating into a rotatory motion on the shaft to which it is fixed, or for admitting of its motion in one direction only. For both purposes an arrangement similar to that shown in the cut is employed. a is the ratchet-wheel, and b the reciprocating lever, to the end of which is jointed a small ratchet or pawl c, furnished with a catch of the same form as the teeth of the wheel, which, when the lever is moved in one direction, slides over the teeth, but in returning draws the wheel with it. The pawl c is forced into engagement with the teeth of the ratchet-wheel by the spring f. The other ratchet, d, which may be used either separately or in combination with the first, permits of the motion of the wheel in the direction of the arrow, but opposes its return in the opposite direction. Also called click-wheel. See also cut under pawl.

Ratchet-wheel.

ratchet-wrench (rach′et-rench), n. A ratchet bed-key wrench.

ratchety (rach′e-ti), a. [< ratchet + -y[1].] Like the movement of a ratchet; jerky; clicking.

Raikes . . . poured out a ratchety but vehement panegyric. The Money-Makers, p. 128.

ratchil, n. See ratchel.

ratchment (rach′ment), n. [< ratch[1] + -ment.] In arch., a flying-buttress which springs from the principals of a herse and abuts against the central or chief principal. Oxford Glossary.

rate[1] (rāt), v.; pret. and pp. rated, ppr. rating. [< ME. raten, chide, scold, in comp., < Sw. rata, reject, refuse, slight, find fault with (cf. ratgods, refuse goods), = Norw. rata, reject, cast aside as rubbish; akin to Norw. rat, refuse, rubbish, trash, = Icel. hrat, hrati, rubbish, trash, skins, stones, etc., of berries; Norw. rata, bad, worthless: see rat[2].] I. trans. 1. To chide with vehemence; reprove; scold; censure violently.

He shal be rated of his studying.
Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 277.

Go, rate thy minions, proud insulting boy!
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 2. 84.

His mother is angry, rates him.
B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, Arg.

2†. To affect by chiding or reproving; restrain by vehement censure.

No words may rate, nor rigour him remove
From greedy hold of that his blouddy feast.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. ix. 31.

II. intrans. To utter vehement censure or reproof; inveigh scoldingly: with at.

Yea, the Moores, meeting with this beast, doe rate and braule at him. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 42.

Such a one
As all day long hath rated at her child,
And vext his day.
Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

★rate[2] (rāt), n. [< OF. rate, price, value, = Pr. Sp. Pg. It. rata = G. rate, < ML. rata, rate, proportion (L. pro rata parte, or pro rata portione, or simply pro rata, according to a certain part or portion (see pro rata, pro-rate)); fem. of L. ratus, determined, fixed, settled, pp. of reri (ind. reor), think, deem, judge, orig. reckon, calculate. From the same L. verb are ult. derived E. rate[3], ratio, ration, reason, areason, arraign[1], etc., ratify, etc.] 1. A reckoning by comparative values or relations; proportional estimation according to some standard; relative amount, quantity, range, or degree: as, the rate of interest is 6 per cent. (that is, $6 for every $100 for every year); the rate per mile of railroad charges, expenses, or speed; a rapid rate of growth or of progress.

He lends out money gratis, and brings down
The rate of usance here with us in Venice.
Shak., M. of V., i. 3. 46.

One of the necessary properties of pure Motion is Velocity. It is not possible to think of Motion without thinking of a corresponding Rate of motion.
A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 52.

As regards travelling, the fastest rate along the high roads was ten miles an hour.
W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 5.

It was no longer practicable to levy the duties on the old plan of one rate for unrefined and another rate for refined sugars. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, IV. 31.

2. Charge or valuation according to a scale or standard; comparative price or amount of demand; a fixed measure of estimation.

A jewel that I have purchased at an infinite rate.
Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 2. 218.

I am not . . . content to part with my commodities at a cheaper rate than I accustomed; look not for it.
B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 1.

They have no Goods but what are brought from Manilo at an extraordinary dear rate. Dampier, Voyages, I. 308.

Servants could be hired of their nominal owners at a barley-corn rate. The Century, XXXIX. 139.

3. A fixed public tax or imposition assessed on property for some local purpose, usually according to income or value: as, poor-rates or church-rates in Great Britain.

They paid the Church and Parish Rate,
And took, but read not the Receit.
Prior, An Epitaph.

The empowering of certain boards to borrow money repayable from the local rates, to employ and pay those out of work. H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 9.

A sewers rate, however, was known as early as the sixth year of Henry VI. (1427).
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 477.

4†. A proportion allotted or permitted; an allotment or provision; a regulated amount or supply.

The one right feeble through the evill rate
Of food which in her duresse she had found.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. viii. 19.

The people shall go out and gather a certain rate every day. Ex. xvi. 4.

5. A relative scale of being, action, or conduct; comparative degree or extent of any mode of existence or procedure; proportion in manner or method: as, an extravagant rate of living or of expenditure. See at any rate, at no rate, below.

With wyse men there is rest & peace, after a blessed rate.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 92.

With might and delight they spent all the night,
And liv'd at a plentiful rate.
Robin Hood and the Ranger (Child's Ballads, V. 210).

With the common rate of men there is nothing commendable but what they themselves may hope to be partakers of. Steele, Spectator, No. 188.

8. The order or class of a vessel, formerly regulated in the United States navy by the number of guns carried, but now by the tonnage displacement. Vessels of 5,000 tons displacement and over are of the first rate, of 3,000 and above but below 5,000 tons of the second rate, of 1,000 and above but below 3,000 tons of the third rate, of less than 1,000 tons of the fourth rate. In classifying the navies of England, France, and the other principal European powers the term class is used instead of rate, and relates not so much to the actual weight or power of the ships as to arbitrary divisions of types of vessels, and to their relative importance as battle-ships, cruisers, etc.

9. In the United States navy, the grade or position of any one of the crew: same as rating[2], 2. — 10. In horology, the daily gain or loss of a chronometer or other timepiece. A losing rate is called by astronomers a positive rate, because it entails a positive correction to the difference of readings of the clock-face. — At any rate, in any manner, or by any means; in any case; at all events; positively; assuredly: as, I shall stay at any rate; at any rate the claim is a valid one.

I have no friend,
Project, design, or country but your favour,
Which I'll preserve at any rate.
Fletcher (and another), False One, i. 1.

At no rate†, in no manner; by no means; not at all. [Rare.]

This day at no rate
Shalt thou performe thy worke, least thou doe draw
My heavy wrath vpon thee.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 16.

County rates, landing-rates, police rate, etc. See county[1], landing, etc. — Rate of change, the limit of the ratio of an infinitesimal increment of any function to that of the independent variable. Thus, that of x^2 relatively to x is $2x$. — Rate of exchange. Same as course of exchange (which see, under exchange). — Rate of profit. See profit. (See also church-rate, poor-rate.) = Syn. 3. Assessment, Impost, etc. See tax.

rate-book (rāt'bůk), n. A book in which a record of rates is kept; a book of valuations.

Horses by papists are not to be ridden;
But sure the Muses' horse was ne'er forbidden;
For in no rate-book was it ever found
That Pegasus was valued at five pound.
Dryden, Don Sebastian, Prol., l. 43.

rateen, n. See ratteen.

ratel (rat'el), n. [F. ratel, < S. Afr. D. ratel, ratel-muis (1727.)] A carnivorous quadruped of the family Mustelidæ and subfamily Mellivorinæ, as Mellivora capensis or M. ratel, the honey-ratel of the Cape of Good Hope, and M. indica, that of India; a honey-badger. See Mellivora, and cut in next column.

Ratel (Mellivora ratel).

ratepayer (rāt'pā″ėr), n. One who is assessed and pays a rate or local tax. [Great Britain.]

In the vestry-meeting the freemen of the township, the ratepayers, still assemble for purposes of local interest, not involved in the manorial jurisdiction.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 43.

They have already in many towns supplied us, at the expense of the ratepayers, with hospitals, museums, free libraries, art galleries, baths, and parks.
Westminster Rev., CXXV. 17.

ratepaying (rāt'pā″ing), a. Paying a local tax; relating to taxation by assessment.

In addition to the . . . eccentricity from an Australian point of view of a ratepaying or property basis for the parliamentary franchise, Tasmania has another legislative peculiarity which she copied from Victoria, and shares only with that colony and with New Zealand.
Sir C. W. Dilke, Probs. of Greater Britain, ii. 4.

And zit schal erthe vn-to erthe rather than he wolde.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 88.

3. More readily or willingly; with better liking; with preference or choice; in preference, as compared with something else.

Men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. John iii. 19.

4. In preference; preferably; with better reason; better.

Give us of your oil. . . . Not so; . . . but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. Mat. xxv. 9.

Dye rather, dye, then ever from her service swerve.
Spenser, F. Q., III. v. 46.

Had he who drew such gladness ever wept?
Ask rather could he else have seen at all,
Or grown in Nature's mysteries an adept?
Lowell, To a Friend.

5. More properly; more correctly speaking; more.

The Doctor by this oversight (or cunningness, rather) got a supply of money. Howell, Letters, IV. 2.

A certain woman . . . had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse. Mark v. 26.

This is an art
Which does mend nature, change it rather, but
The art itself is nature. Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 96.

Covered with dust and blood and wounds, and haggard with fatigue and horror, they looked like victims rather than like warriors. Irving, Granada, p. 92.

6. On the contrary; to the contrary of what has been just stated.—7. In a greater degree; much; considerably; also, in colloquial use, in some degree; somewhat: qualifying a verb.

He sought her through the world, but sought in vain,
And, no-where finding, rather fear'd her slain.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., l. 799.

Wal, of course he made his court to Ruth; and the General, he rather backed him up in it.
H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 37.

8. In some degree or measure; somewhat; moderately: usually qualifying an adverb or an adjective: as, she is rather pretty. [Chiefly colloq.]

An Indian camp is a rather interesting, though very dirty, place to visit. The Century, XXXVI. 39.

[In this sense often used ironically, in answering a question, as an emphatic affirmative.

"Do you know the mayor's house?" "Rather," replied the boots significantly, as if he had some good reason to remember it. Dickens.]

Had rather. See to have rather, under have.—Leet rather. See leet[4].—Rather better than, somewhat in excess of; rather more than.

Five hundred and fifty musketeers, rather better than three to one. G. P. R. James, Arrah Neil, p. 60.

Rather . . . than otherwise. See otherwise.—The rather, by so much the more; especially; for better reason; for particular cause.

You are come to me in happy time;
The rather for I have some sport in hand.
Shak., T. of the S., Ind., i. 91.

This I the rather write, that we may know there are other Parts of the World than those which to us are known.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 50.

ratherish (raᴛʜ'ėr-ish), adv. [< rather + -ish[1].] Slightly; to a small extent; in some degree. [Colloq.]

Lavalette is ratherish against Popish temporality; Gen. Guyon is rather favorable to it.
New York Tribune, April 22, 1862.

Rathke's duct. The Müllerian duct when it is persistent in the male.

Rathke's trabeculæ. See trabecula.

rathly†, adv. [ME., also rathely, radly, radliche, < AS. hrædlice, quickly, hastily, speedily, < hræth, quick: see rath[1].] In a rath manner; quickly; suddenly.

Thomas rathely vpe he rase.
Thomas of Erseldoune (Child's Ballads, I. 100).

Ryse we now full radly, rest here no longer,
And I shall tell you full tyte, and tary no thing.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 772.

rat-hole (rat'hōl), n. 1. A hole gnawed in woodwork, etc., by a rat or rats.—2. In printing, same as pigeonhole, 6.

ratholite (rath'ō-līt), n. Same as pectolite.

rathripe (rāᴛʜ'rīp), a. and n. [< ME. rathripe*, < AS. rædripe, hrædripe, early ripe, < hræth, quick, + ripe, ripe: see rath[1] and ripe. Cf. rareripe.] I. a. Early ripe; ripe before the season; rareripe. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Such as delight in rathripe fruits. Fuller.

Rathripe barley, barley derived from a long succession of crops on warm gravelly soil, so that it ripens earlier than common barley under different circumstances.

II. n. A rareripe. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

ratifia†, ratifie†, n. Obsolete forms of ratafia.

ratification (rat″i-fi-kā'shọn), n. [Early mod. E. ratificacion, < OF. ratification, ratificacion, F. ratification = Pr. ratiffication = Sp. ratificación = Pg. ratificação = It. ratificazione, < ML. ratificatio(n-), < ratificare, ratify: see ratify.] 1. The act of ratifying; the act by which a competent authority gives sanction and validity to something done by another; also, the state of being ratified; confirmation: as, the ratification of a treaty, or of a contract or promise.

The kyng of England sent Sir Nicholas Carew, knight, master of his horses, and Doctor Sampson, to Bononie, for the ratificacion of the league concluded at Cambray.
Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 21.

It was argued by Monroe, Gerry, Howel, Ellery, and myself that by the modern usage of Europe the ratification was considered as the act which gave validity to a treaty, until which it was not obligatory.
Jefferson, Autobiography, p. 46.

2. In law, the adoption by a person, as binding upon himself, of an act previously done in his name or on his behalf, or in such relation that he may claim it as done for his benefit, although done under such circumstances as would not bind him except by his subsequent consent, as in the case of an act done by a stranger having at the same time no authority to act as his agent, or by an agent not having adequate authority to do the act. Intention to ratify is not necessary in order to constitute a ratification, for an acceptance of the results of the act may itself be conclusive upon the party. But a knowledge of all the material circumstances is usually necessary in order to make a ratification binding.—Ratification by a wife, in Scots law, a declaration on oath made by a wife in presence of a justice of the peace (her husband being absent) that a deed she has executed has been made freely, and that she has not been induced to make it by her husband through force or fear.—Ratification meeting, in the United States, a political meeting called for the purpose of expressing approval of the nominations made by a political party, and of creating enthusiasm for their support.

ratifier (rat'i-fī-ėr), n. One who or that which ratifies or sanctions.

Antiquity forgot, custom not known,
The ratifiers and props of every word.
Shak., Hamlet, iv. 5. 105.

ratify (rat'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. ratified, ppr. ratifying. [< OF. ratefier, F. ratifier = Pr. Sp. Pg. ratificar = It. ratificare, < ML. ratificare, confirm, ratify, < L. ratus, fixed, settled, + -ficare, < facere, make: see rate[2] and -fy.] 1. To confirm; establish; settle conclusively or authoritatively; make certain or lasting.

We have ratified to them the borders of Judea.
1 Mac. xi. 34.

Covenants will be ratified and confirmed, as it were by the Stygian oath. Bacon, Political Fables, ii., Expl.

Shaking hands with emphasis, . . . as if they were ratifying some solemn league and covenant.
Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xvii.

2. To validate by some formal act of approval; accept and sanction, as something done by an agent or a representative; confirm as a valid act or procedure.

This Accord and final Peace signed by both Kings was ratified by their two eldest Sons.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 125.

A solemn compact let us ratify,
And witness ev'ry power that rules the sky.
Pope, Odyssey, xiv.

The unfortunate king, unable to make even a protest for the rights of his son, was prevailed on to ratify the agreement. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 677.

Ratifying convention, a convention held for the purpose of ratifying certain measures, acts, etc.: specifically used in United States politics of the conventions held by the several States of the American Union for the purpose of ratifying the Federal Constitution of 1787.

ratihabition† (rat″i-hā-bish'ọn), n. [= Sp. ratihabición = Pg. ratihabição = It. ratiabizione, < LL. ratihabitio(n-), ratification at law, < L. ratus, fixed, settled (see rate[2]), + habere, have: see habit.] Approval, as of something done or to be done; precedent or subsequent consent; sanction; confirmation of authority or of action.

ratine (ra-tēn'), n. [F.] 1. A woolen fabric, resembling a light-weight chinchilla.—2. A loosely woven cotton fabric resembling either uncut cotton velvet or Turkish toweling. Also known as agaric (mushroom) and éponge (sponge) cloth.

rating[1] (rā'ting), n. [Verbal n. of rate[1], v.] A scolding.

rating[2] (rā'ting), n. [Verbal n. of rate[2], v.] 1. A fixing of rates; proportionate distribution as to charge or compensation, determination of relative values or rights.

The loss by any railway company of its whole share of this traffic, in consequence of being crippled in competition by regulations as to rating.
Contemporary Rev., LI. 78.

The following table of ratings and of the number pensioned at each rate shows how the allowance is distributed among invalid survivors. The Century, XXXVIII. 636.

2. Classification according to grade or rank; determination of relative standing; hence, rank or grade. The rating of men in the navy signifies the grade in which they are rated or entered in the ship's books. The rating of ships is the division into grades (see rate[2], n., 8) by which the complement of officers and certain allowances are determined.

ratio (rā'shiō), n. [< L. ratio, a reckoning, account, calculation, relation, reference, reason, etc., < reri, pp. ratus, think, deem, estimate: see rate[2], and cf. ration and reason, from the same L. noun.] 1. The relation between two similar magnitudes in respect to quantuplicity; the relation between two similar quantities in respect to how many times one makes so many times the other. There is no intelligible difference between a ratio and a quotient of similar quantities; they are simply two modes of expression connected with different associations. But it was contrary to the old usage to speak of a ratio as a quantity—a usage leading to intolerable complications. Thus, instead of saying that the momentum of a moving particle is the product of its mass into its velocity—a mode of expression both convenient and philosophical—the older writers say that the momenta of two particles are in the compound ratio of their masses and velocities. This language, which betrays several errors of logic, is now disused; although some writers still persist in making numbers the only subjects of addition and multiplication. By mathematicians ratio is now conceived and spoken of as synonymous with quotient.

The numbers which specify a strain are mere ratios, and are therefore independent of units.
J. D. Everett, Units and Physical Constants, p. 45.

2. Proportion of relations or conditions; coincident agreement or variation; correspondence in rate; equivalence of relative movement or change.

There has been a constant ratio kept between the stringency of mercantile restraints and the stringency of other restraints. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 327.

3. Reason; cause: often used as a Latin word in current Latin phrases.

In this consists the ratio and essential ground of the gospel doctrine. Waterland.

4. In musical acoustics, the relation between the vibration-numbers of two tones. It is the physical or mathematical representation of the interval between them.—5. In civil law, an account; a cause, or the giving of judgment therein.—Alternate ratio, the ratio of the first to the third or the second to the fourth term of a proportion.—Anharmonic ratio. See anharmonic.—Arithmetical ratio. See arithmetical.—Change-ratio. See change.—Composition of ratios, the uniting of two or more simple ratios into one, by taking the product of the antecedents and the product of the consequents.—Compound ratio. See compound[1].—Consequent of a ratio. See consequent.—Direct ratio. (a) A ratio not inverse. (b) Loosely, a direct and simple ratio: as, the weights of bodies are in the direct ratio of their masses—that is, the weight of one is to that of another as the mass of the former is to that of the latter. Also direct proportion.—Direction ratio, duple ratio. See the qualifying words.—Dissimilar ratios, unequal quotients.—Division of a ratio. See division.—Duplicate ratio, a ratio of squares. The old writers, instead of saying that the distance passed over by a falling body is proportional to the square of the time, say that the spaces are in the duplicate ratios of the times.—Inverse or reciprocal ratio, in math., the ratio of the reciprocals of two quantities.—Irrational ratio, a ratio which is an incommensurable.—Mixed ratio. See mixed[1].—Modular ratio. See modular.—Multiplicate ratio, a ratio of powers.—Oxygen ratio, in mineral., the ratio between the number of oxygen atoms belonging to the different groups of acidic or basic compounds in the composition of a mineral. The oxygen ratio of silica, sesquioxid, and protoxid in garnet is 2 : 1 : 1. —Pedal ratio, in anc. pros., the proportion of the number of times in the arsis to that in the thesis, or vice versa. The pedal ratio (λόγος ποδικός) is usually either equal or isorrhythmic ratio (1 : 1), diplasic or double ratio (1 : 2), or hemiolic ratio (2 : 3 = 1 : 1½). Besides these three, the ordinary pedal ratios, two others were anciently recognized—the triplasic or triple ratio (1 : 3), and the epitritic ratio (3 : 4 = 1 : 1⅓). The dochmius, regarded as a single foot, had a pedal ratio different from all these (3 : 5; ⏑ – | ⏑ –). Isorrhythmic, diplasic, hemiolic, triplasic, epitritic, and dochmiac feet are feet having the pedal ratios just named. See foot, 11, irrational, rhythm.—Prime and ultimate ratios, phrases first introduced, at least in a system, by Newton, who preferred them to the terms suggested by his own method of fluxions. The method of prime and ultimate ratios is a method of calculation which may be considered as an extension of the ancient method of exhaustions. It may be thus explained: let there be two variable quantities constantly approaching each other in value, so that their ratio or quotient continually approaches to unity, and at last differs from unity by less than any assignable quantity; the ultimate ratio of these two quantities is said to be a ratio of equality. In general, when different variable quantities respectively and simultaneously approach other quantities, considered as invariable, so that the differences between the variable and the invariable quantities become at the same time less than any assignable quantity, the ultimate ratios of the variables are the ratios of the invariable quantities or limits to which they continually and simultaneously approach. They are called prime ratios or ultimate ratios according as the ratios of the variables are considered as receding from or approaching to the ratios of the limits. The first section of Newton's "Principia" contains the development of prime and ultimate ratios, with various propositions.—Progression with n ratios. See progression.—Quadruple ratio, the ratio of 4 to 1.—Quadruplicate ratio, a ratio of fourth powers.—Quintuple ratio, the ratio of 5 to 1.—Ratio cognoscendi (L.), a reason.—Ratio decidendi (L.), in law, the ground or reason on which a judicial decision is conceived as proceeding. The effect of such a decision as a precedent or evidence of the law is largely dependent on the ratio decidendi, which is usually indicated in the opinions of the court, but often obscurely or with conflict; hence what was the ratio decidendi is often a question for commentators and text-writers.—Ratio essendi (L.), a cause.—Rational ratio, a ratio between rational quantities.—Ratio of equality. See equality.—Ratio of exchange, in polit. econ., the proportion in which a given quantity of one commodity may be exchanged for a given quantity of another, especially when the commodities correspond in form and mode of measurement: as, the ratio of exchange between gold and silver, or between wheat and barley.

> When I proposed in the first edition of this book to use Ratio of Exchange instead of the word value, the expression had been so little if at all employed by English Economists that it amounted to an innovation. . . . Yet ratio is unquestionably the correct scientific term, and the only term which is strictly and entirely correct.
> W. S. Jevons. Theory of Polit. Econ., p. 89.

Ratio of greater (or lesser) inequality, the ratio of a greater quantity to a lesser one (or of a lesser to a greater).—Ratio of similitude, in geom., the ratio between corresponding dimensions of similar figures. See homothetic.—Ratio sufficiens (L.). Same as sufficient reason (which see, under reason).—Reciprocal ratio. Same as inverse ratio.—Simple ratio. (a) A ratio between first powers. (b) A ratio not compound.—Subduple ratio. See duple.—Subduplicate ratio, an inverse ratio of squares (sub in all names of ratio indicating the inversion of the ratio): as, the gravity of two equal masses is in the subduplicate ratio of their distances from the gravitating center.—Submultiple ratio, the ratio which exists between an aliquot part of any number or quantity and the number or quantity itself: thus, the ratio of 3 to 21 is submultiple, 21 being a multiple of 3.—To cut a line in extreme and mean ratio. See extreme.—Triple ratio, the ratio of 3 to 1.

ratiocinate (rash-i-os'i-nāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. ratiocinated, ppr. ratiocinating. [< L. ratiocinatus, pp. of ratiocinari (> It. raziocinare = Sp. Pg. raciocinar = F. ratiociner), reckon, compute, calculate, consider, deliberate, meditate, reason, argue (cf. ratiocinium, a reckoning, a computation, > It. raziocinio = Sp. Pg. raciocinio, reasoning), < ratio(n-), reckoning, reason: see ratio, reason.] To reason; from two judgments to infer a third. The word usually implies an elaborate deductive operation.

ratiocinate (rash-i-os'i-nāt), a. [< L. ratiocinatus, pp. of ratiocinari, reason: see the verb.] Reasoned about.—Ratiocinate reason. See reason.

ratiocination (rash-i-os-i-nā'shon), n. [< F. ratiocination = Pr. raciocinacio = Sp. raciocinación = Pg. raciocinação (cf. It. raziocinamento, raziocinio, reasoning), < L. ratiocinatio(n-), reasoning, argumentation, a syllogism, < ratiocinari, pp. ratiocinatus, reason: see ratiocinate.] 1. The mental process of passing from the cognition of premises to the cognition of the conclusion; reasoning. Most writers make ratiocination synonymous with reasoning. J. S. Mill and others hold that the word is usually limited to necessary reasoning. The Latin word is especially applied by Cicero to probable reasoning.

> The great instrument that this work [spiritual meditation] is done by is ratiocination, reasoning the case with yourselves, discourse of mind, cogitation, or thinking; or, if you will, call it consideration.
> Baxter, Saints' Rest, iv. 8.

> The schoolmen make a third act of the mind, which they call ratiocination, and we may stile it the generation of a judgement from others actually in our understanding.
> A. Tucker, Light of Nature, I. i. 11.

> Ratiocination is the great principle of order in thinking; it reduces a chaos into harmony; it catalogues the accumulations of knowledge; it maps out for us the relations of its separate departments; it puts us in the way to correct its own mistakes.
> J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 273.

2. A mental product and object consisting of premises and a conclusion drawn from them; inference; an argumentation.

> Can any kind of ratiocination allow Christ all the marks of the Messiah, and yet deny him to be the Messiah?
> South.

> Ratiocination denotes properly the process, but, improperly, also the product of reasoning.
>
> Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, xv.

=Syn. Reasoning, etc. See inference.

ratiocinative (rash-i-os'i-nā-tiv), a. [< F. ratiocinatif, < L. ratiocinativus, of or belonging to reasoning, syllogistic, argumentative, < ratiocinari, reason: see ratiocinate.] Of the nature of reasoning; pertaining to or connected with the act of reasoning. The word is misused by some modern writers. See ratiocination, 2.

> The conclusion is attained quasi per saltum, and without any thing of ratiocinative process.
> Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 51.

> The ratiocinative meditativeness of his character.
> Coleridge.

> Again, it not unfrequently happens that, while the keenness of the ratiocinative faculty enables a man to see the ultimate result of a complicated problem in a moment, it takes years for him to embrace it as a truth, and to recognize it as an item in the circle of his knowledge.
>

ratiocinatory (rash-i-os'i-nā-tō-ri), a. [< ★ratiocinate + -ory.] Same as ratiocinative. [Rare.]

ration (rā'shon or rash'on), n. [< F. ration = Sp. ración = Pg. ração, reção = It. razione, a ration, a rate or allowance, < L. ratio(n-), a calculation, reckoning, hence in ML. a computed share or allowance of food: see ratio, reason (which are doublets of ration), and cf. rate[2].] 1. An allowance of means of subsistence for a fixed period of time; specifically, in the army and navy, an allotment or apportionment of provisions for daily consumption to each officer and man, or of forage for each horse. Officers' rations are generally commuted for a money payment at a prescribed rate; and soldiers' and sailors' rations may be partly or wholly commuted under some circumstances.

2. Any stated or fixed amount or quantity dealt out; an allowance or allotment.

> At this rate [two years and a half for three vowels], to master the whole alphabet, consonants and all, would be a task fitter for the centurial adolescence of Methuselah than for our less liberal ration of years.
>
> Lowell, Harvard Anniversary.

ration (rā'shon or rash'on), v. t. [< ration, n.] 1. To supply with rations; provision.

> It had now become evident that the army could not be rationed by a wagon train over the single narrow and almost impassable road between Milliken's Bend and Perkins' plantation. U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 471.

2. To divide into rations; distribute or apportion in rations. [Rare.]

> The presence of hunger began; they began to ration out the bread. The Nation, March 9, 1871, p. 160.

rationability (rash'on-a-bil'i-ti), n. [= Sp. racionabilidad = Pg. racionabilidade = It. razionabilità, < LL. rationabilita(t-)s, < rationabilis, reasonable: see rationable.] The possession of reason, as the distinctive attribute of man.

> Rationability, being but a faculty or specifical quality, is a substantial part of a man, because it is a part of his definition, or his essential difference.
> Bramhall, ii. 24. (Davies.)

rationable (rash'on-a-bl), a. [= OF. rationable = Sp. racionable = Pg. racionavel = It. razionabile, < LL. rationabilis, reasonable, rational, < L. ratio(n-), reason: see reason.] Reasonable, as an agent or an act.

> She was, I take it, on this matter not quite rationable.
> Miss Edgeworth, Belinda, xxvi.

★rational (rash'on-al), a. and n. [I. a. < OF. rationel, rational, F. rationnel = Pr. Sp. Pg. racional = It. razionale, < L. rationalis, of or belonging to reason, rational, reasonable, < ratio(n-), reason: see ratio, ration, reason. II. n. < OF. rational, < ML. rationale, a pontifical stole, a pallium, an ornament worn over the chasuble, neut. of L. rationalis, rational: see I.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or springing from the reason, in the sense of the highest faculty of cognition.

> He confesses a rational sovrantie of soule, and freedom of will in every man. Milton, Eikonoklastes, vi.

> Devout from constitution rather than from rational conviction. Macaulay, Essays, History, p. 394.

> Contradiction . . . must be absurd when it is regarded as fixed, and rational when it is regarded as superable.
>
> Veitch, Introd. to Descartes's Method, p. clxxviii.

2. Endowed with reason, in the sense of that faculty which distinguishes man from the brutes: as, man is a rational animal.

> It is our glory and happiness to have a rational nature.
>
> Law.

> Are these men rational, or are not the apes of Borneo more wise? Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, let. x.

> He [man] is rational and moral according to the organic internal conformation of his mind.
> Swedenborg, Christian Psychol. (tr. by Gorman), p. 72.

> There has been an idea of good, suggested by the consciousness of unfulfilled possibilities of the rational nature common to all men.
> T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 207.

3. Conformable to the precepts of reason, especially of the practical reason; reasonable; wise.

> You are one
> Of the deepest politics I ever met,
> And the most subtly rational.
>
> B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, iii. 4.

> He had his Humour as other Men, but certainly he was a solid rational Man. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 17.

> His bounties are more rational and moderate than before. Goldsmith, Vicar, iii.

4. In arith. and alg.: (a) Expressible in finite terms: applied to expressions in which no extraction of a root is left, or, at least, none such indicated which cannot be actually performed by known processes. The contraries of these are called surd or irrational quantities. Thus 2, 12½, $\cdot 9$, are rational quantities, and $\sqrt{2}$, $\sqrt[3]{4}$, etc., are irrational or surd quantities, because their values can only be approximately and not accurately assigned. (b) In Euclid's "Elements" and commentaries, etc., on that work, commensurable with a given line. In senses (a) and (b) rational (Latin rationalis) translates Greek ῥητός, expressible. It may be remarked that some inconvenience arises from the fact that words derived from Latin ratio, originally signifying an account, are used to translate words connected with Greek λόγος, whose original meaning (a word) is entirely different.

5. In anc. pros., capable of measurement in terms of the metrical unit (semeion or mora). A rational time (χρόνος ῥητός) is a time divisible by this unit without remainder. Thus, disemic times (times of two semeia) are rational, while irrational times (χρόνοι ἄλογοι) can be expressed only by fractions (as ¾, 1½, 2½, 2⅝) of a semeion.—Geometrically rational, algebraic.—Rational and integral function. See function.—Rational certainty, cognition, cosmology. See the nouns.—Rational class of functions, a class which is relative to a group of operations produced by combinations of additions, subtractions, multiplications, and divisions.—Rational composition, in logic: (a) The composition of elements which only differ as viewed by the mind, and not as they exist, as the composition of essence and existence, of being and relation, etc. (b) The union of several objects so far as they are brought together into or under one concept.—Rational derivative. See derivative.—Rational formula. See chemical formula, under chemical.—Rational fraction, function. See the nouns.—Rational horizon. (a) The astronomical horizon. (b) The limits of rational knowledge.—Rational inference†, a ratiocinative inference or syllogism.—Rational instinct, an innate idea, or natural belief.—Rational knowledge. (a) Knowledge of an object through its cause or causes.

> The knowledge why or how a thing is is termed the knowledge of the cause; philosophical, scientific, rational knowledge. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., iii.

(b) Knowledge springing directly or indirectly from reason, and not from experience.—Rational mechanics, the science which establishes and puts into shape the laws of motion.—Rational number, a number expressible as an ordinary fraction, in contradistinction to a continued fraction.—Rational power, proposition, ratio, etc. See the nouns.—Rational psychology. See psychology.—Rational theology, theology so far as drawn from a priori ideas.—Rational transformation, the transformation of a geometrical continuum into another, so as to make a one-to-one correspondence between the points of the two, except for a finite number of exceptional points.=Syn. Rational, Reasonable, sensible, enlightened, discreet, intelligent, sane, sound. The first two words are somewhat different, according as they refer to persons or things. As to persons, rational is the more speculative, reasonable the more practical term; rational means possessing the faculty of reason, while reasonable means exercising reason in its broader sense, in opposition to unreasonable—that is, guided by prejudice, fancy, etc. In fever the patient may become irrational and give irrational answers; when he is rational he may through weakness and fretfulness make unreasonable demands of his physician. As to things, the distinction continues between the narrower and the broader senses: a rational proposition is one that might proceed from a rational mind; a reasonable proposition is one that is marked by common sense and fairness. It is irrational to look for a coal-mine in a granite-ledge; it is unreasonable to expect good work for poor pay. See absurd.

II. n. 1. A quiddity; a universal; a nature. Thus, in the first quotation "the world of rationals" is the rational world, the system of general or possible entities. The conception is Platonic.

> He, the great Father, kindled at one flame
> The world of rationals. Young, Night Thoughts, iv.

This absolute end, prescribed by Reason necessarily and a priori, which is for all rational beings as such, can be nothing but Reason itself, or the Universe of Rationals.
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 362.

2. Eccles.: (a) The breastplate of the Jewish high-priest. The name rational for the Jewish high-priest's breastplate (Hebrew chōshen, an 'ornament,' according to others a 'pouch' or 'receptacle') comes from the Latin rationale, a mistaken translation in the Vulgate of the word λόγιον or λογεῖον in the Septuagint, etc., meaning an 'oracle' or 'oracular instrument,' with allusion to the consultation of the Urim and Thummim. Hence—(b) A square plate of gold, silver, or embroidery, either jeweled or enameled, formerly worn on the breast over the chasuble by bishops during the celebration of mass. Also pectoral and rationale in both senses.

But upon the English chasuble there was to be seen, more or less often, up to the fourteenth century, an appendage, the rational, as beautiful as becoming, which is never found adorning the same Anglo-Saxon vesture.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, i. 363.

rationale (rash-o-nā′lē), n. [L., neut. sing. of rationalis, of or belonging to reason, rational: see rational.] 1. The rational basis or motive of something; that which accounts for or explains the existence of something; reason for being.

The rationale of your scheme is just:
"Pay toll here, there pursue your pleasure free."
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 292.

Thoroughly to realize the truth that with the mind as with the body the ornamental precedes the useful, it is needful to glance at its rationale.
H. Spencer, Education, p. 25.

2. A rational explanation or statement of reasons; an argumentative or theoretical account; a reasoned exposition.

I admire that there is not a rationale to regulate such trifling accidents, which consume much time, and is a reproch to the gravity of so greate an assembly of sober men.
Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 23, 1666.

Since the religion of one seems madness unto another, to afford an account or rationale of old rites requires no rigid reader. Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, iv.

Theological dogma is nothing in the world but a rationale of the relations in which God places Himself towards us in the very act of revealing Himself.
Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 345.

3. Same as rational, 2.

rationalisation, rationalise, etc. See rationalization, etc.

rationalism (rash′ọn-al-izm), n. [= F. rationalisme = Sp. Pg. racionalismo = It. razionalismo = G. rationalismus; as rational + -ism.] 1. In general, adherence to the supremacy of reason in matters of belief or conduct, in contradistinction to the submission of reason to authority; thinking for one's self.

From the infinite variability of opinion our great writers deduced the necessity of toleration in the place of persecution and of rationalism in place of obedience to authority. Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, ii. ¶ 4.

2. In theol.: (a) In general, the subjection of religious doctrine and Scriptural interpretation to the test of human reason or understanding; the rejection of dogmatic authority as against reason or conscience; rational latitude of religious thought or belief.

What seemed most to protect the dogma of the Church from depravation really left it without defence against the scholastic rationalism. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 25.

(b) More specifically, as used with reference to the modern school or party of rationalists, that system of doctrine which, in its extreme form, denies the existence of any authoritative and supernatural revelation, and maintains that the human reason is of itself, and unaided by special divine inspiration, adequate to ascertain all attainable religious truth. As a theological system rationalism regards the reason as the sole, final, and adequate arbiter of all religious questions, and is thus opposed to mysticism, which maintains the existence in man of a spiritual power transcending observation and the reasoning faculty. As a doctrinal system, it includes the doctrines founded upon rationalistic philosophy as a postulate, and embraces a denial of the authority of the Scripture and the supernatural origin of Christianity, but maintains as at least probable opinions the existence of a God and the immortality of the soul, and as indisputable facts the great principles of the moral law. As an interpretation of Scripture, it holds that the Scriptures themselves, rightly interpreted, corroborate rationalism, and thus it eliminates from them all supernatural elements. The term is, however, one of somewhat vague import, and is used with various modified meanings in modern polemical theology.

3. In metaph., the doctrine of a priori cognitions; the doctrine that knowledge is not all produced by the action of outward things upon the senses, but partly arises from the natural adaptation of the mind to think things that are true.

The form of Rationalism which is now in the ascendant resembles the theory of natural evolution in this, that as the latter finds the race more real than the individual, and the individual to exist only in the race, so the former looks upon the individual reason as but a finite manifestation of the universal reason.
W. R. Sorley, Ethics of Naturalism, p. 18.

rationalist (rash′ọn-al-ist), n. [= F. rationaliste = Sp. Pg. racionalista = It. razionalista = D. G. Dan. Sw. rationalist; as rational + -ist.] 1. One who follows reason and not authority in thought or speculation; a believer in the supremacy of reason over prescription or precedent.

There is a new sect sprung up among them, and these are the rationalists; and what their reason dictates them in church or state stands for good, until they be convinced with better. Clarendon, State Papers, II. xi., Introd.

2. In theol., one who applies rational criticism to the claims of supernatural authority or revelation; specifically, one of a school or party, originating in Germany in the eighteenth century, who maintain as an ultimate conclusion that the human reason is of itself, and unaided by special divine inspiration, adequate to ascertain all attainable truth, and who accordingly, in interpretation of the Scripture, regards it as only an illustration and affirmation, not as a divine revelation, of truth. See rationalism, 2 (b).—3. A believer in metaphysical rationalism.

rationalistic (rash″ọn-a-lis′tik), a. [< rationalist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to rationalists or rationalism; conformable to or characterized by rationalism: as, rationalistic opinions; a rationalistic interpretation.

From the publication of the essays of Montaigne we may date the influence of that gifted and ever enlarging rationalistic school who gradually effected the destruction of the belief in witchcraft. Lecky, Rationalism, I. 114.

Rationalistic Monarchians. See Monarchian.

rationalistical (rash″ọn-a-lis′ti-kal), a. [< rationalistic + -al.] Same as rationalistic.

rationalistically (rash″ọn-a-lis′ti-kal-i), adv. In a rationalistic manner.

★rationality (rash-o-nal′i-ti), n. [< F. rationalité = Sp. racionalidad = Pg. racionalidade = It. razionalità, < LL. rationalita(t-)s, reasonableness, rationality, < L. rationalis, reasonable: see rational.] 1. The rational faculty; the power of reasoning; possession of reason; intelligence.

God has made rationality the common portion of mankind. Dr. H. More.

Yea, the highest and most improved parts of rationality are frequently caught in the entanglements of a tenacious imagination, and submit to its obstinate but delusory dictamens. Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, xi.

2. The character of being rational; accordance with reason; reasonableness; congruity; fitness.

Well directed intentions, whose rationalities will not bear a rigid examination. Sir T. Browne.

"It may do good, and it can do no harm," is the plea for many actions which have scarcely more rationality than worship of a painted stone.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., App. A.

3. The exercise, result, or manifestation of reason; rational principle, motive, or causation; basis in reason.

An essay on the "Rationality of History," . . . in which history is represented as a "struggle towards rational freedom." H. Sidgwick, Mind, XIII. 406.

The solid black vote, cast, we said, without rationality at the behest of a few scoundrels. The Century, XXX. 676.

rationalization (rash″ọn-al-i-zā′shọn), n. [< rationalize + -ation.] 1. The act of rationalizing; a making rational or intelligible; subjection to rational tests or principles.

Lysons argues very strongly in favour of the famous story of "Whittington and his Cat," and rejects the rationalization which explains the legend by supposing Whittington's fortunes to have been made in the voyages of a mediæval cat or merchant-vessel. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 556.

2. In alg., the process of clearing an equation from radical signs.

Also spelled rationalisation.

rationalize (rash′ọn-al-īz), v.; pret. and pp rationalized, ppr. rationalizing. [< F. rationaliser; as rational + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To make conformable to reason; give rationality to; cause to be or to appear reasonable or intelligible.

Eusebius tells us that religion was divided by the Romans into three parts: the mythology, or legends that had descended from the poets; the interpretations or theories by which the philosophers endeavoured to rationalise, filter, or explain away these legends; and the ritual or official religious observances. Lecky, European Morals, I. 429.

When life has been duly rationalized by science, it will be seen that among a man's duties care of the body is imperative. H. Spencer, in Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 357.

The faculties of the mind have been rationalised into functions of the mind; so many sorts of operations, classified as observation demands.
Hodgson, Phil. of Reflection, II. 247.

2. To subject to the test of reason; explain or interpret by rational principles; treat in the manner of a rationalist: as, to rationalize religion or the Scriptures.—3. In alg., to free from radical signs.

II. intrans. To think for one's self; employ the reason as a supreme test; argue or speculate upon the basis of rationality or rationalism; act as a rationalist.

If they [certain theologians] rationalise as the remarkable school of Cambridge Platonists rationalised, it is with a sincere belief that they are only bringing out the full meaning of the doctrine which they expound.
Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, ii. ¶ 60.

To rationalise meant to apply the canons of our limited enlightenment to the unlimited ranges of actuality.
W. Wallace, Logic of Hegel, Prolegomena, vi.

In order to know, in any wide and large sense, we must rationalize.
Henry Calderwood, New Princeton Rev., III. 23.

Also spelled rationalise.

rationalizer (rash′ọn-al-ī-zėr), n. One who rationalizes, or practises the methods of the rationalists; one who tests doctrines, principles, etc., by the light of abstract reason, or who employs reason alone in interpretation or explanation. Also spelled rationaliser.

Like many other rationalisers, he [Thomas Burnet] fancied himself to be confirming instead of weakening Scriptural authority. Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, i. ¶ 8.

★rationally (rash′ọn-al-i), adv. In a rational manner; in consistency with reason; reasonably: as, to speak rationally; to behave rationally.

rationalness (rash′ọn-al-nes), n. The state of being rational, or consistent with reason.

rationary (rash′ọn-ā-ri), a. [= F. rationnaire, one who receives rations, one who receives a salary, < ML. rationarius, relating to accounts, an accountant, < L. ratio(n-), a reckoning, an account, ML. allowance: see ration.] Of or pertaining to accounts. [Rare.]

ration-money (rā′shọn-mun″i), n. Money paid as commutation for rations.

Ratitæ (rā-tī′tē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (sc. Aves, birds) of ratitus: see ratite.] One of the prime divisions of birds, including the ostriches, cassowaries, emus, and kiwis; the group of struthious birds, as contrasted with Carinatæ, to which all other existing birds belong. The Ratitæ are flightless, with more or less rudimentary wings; the sternum is a flattened or concavo-convex buckler-like bone, without a keel, developing from paired lateral centers of ossification. Associated with this condition of the sternum is a special configuration of the scapular arch, the scapula and coracoid meeting at a very obtuse angle, or with nearly coincident axes, and clavicles being absent or defective. The bones of the palate are peculiarly arranged, the pterygoids articulating with the basisphenoid in a manner only paralleled in Carinatæ in the tinamous. The Cretaceous genus Hesperornis was ratite in sternal characters, but is excluded from Ratitæ by the possession of teeth. The families of living Ratitæ usually recognized are the Struthionidæ, Rheidæ, Casuariidæ, and Apterygidæ; the genera are Struthio, Rhea, Casuarius and Dromæus, and Apteryx; the species are few. The extinct New Zealand moas (Dinornithidæ and Palapterygidæ) and the Madagascar Æpyornithidæ are also Ratitæ. The name was introduced by B. Merrem in 1813; it passed almost unnoticed for some years, but has lately come into almost universal use.

ratitate (rat′i-tāt), a. [< ratite + -ate[1].] Same as ratite. [Rare.]

ratite (rā′tīt), a. [< NL. ratitus, < L. ratitus, marked with the figure of a raft, < ratis, a raft.] Raft-breasted, as a bird; having a flat breast-bone or sternum with no keel; having no keel, as a breast-bone; ecarinate; of or pertaining to the Ratitæ.

ratiuncule (rā-shi-ung′kūl), n. [< NL. ratiuncula*, dim. of L. ratio(n-), a ratio: see ratio.] A ratio very near unity.

rati-weights, n. Same as retti-weight.

rat-kangaroo (rat′kang-gạ-rö″), n. A kangaroo-rat; any species of Hypsiprymnus. See cut under kangaroo-rat.

ratline, ratlin (rat′-lin), n. [Also corruptly ratling, rattling; formerly also rare-line; appar. < rat[1] + line[2] (corrupted to rare-line, as if 'thin line'?); a seamen's jocular name, as if forming ladders for the rats to climb by. Cf. D. weeflijn, ratline, lit. 'web-line.'] Naut., Ratlines (a, a).

one of a series of small ropes or lines which traverse the shrouds horizontally, thus forming the steps of ladders for going aloft.—Sheer ratline, every fifth ratline, which is extended to the swifter and after shroud.

ratline-stuff (rat'lin-stuf), n. Naut., small tarred rope, of from 12 to 24 threads, from which ratlines are made.

ratling (rat'ling), n. A corruption of ratline.

ratmara (rat'ma-rä), n. [Native name.] An East Indian lichen, used in dyeing.

rat-mole (rat'mōl), n. Same as mole-rat.

raton†, n. An obsolete form of ratten.

ratoner†, n. See rattener.

Ratonia (rā-tō'ni-ä), n. [NL.] A former genus of Sapindaceæ, now referred to Matayba. See bastard mahogany, under mahogany.

ratoon (ra-tön'), n. [Also rattoon; = Sp. retoño, a new sprout or shoot (> retoñar, sprout anew, put forth shoots again), < Hind. ratun, a second crop of sugar-cane from the same roots.] 1. A sprout or shoot springing up from the root of a plant after it has been cropped; especially, a new shoot from the root of a sugar-cane that has been cut down. Compare plant-cane.

Plant canes generally take more lime than ratoons to cause the juices to granulate.
T. Roughley, Jamaica Planter's Guide (1823), p. 344.

Next year [second crop] the cane sprouts from the stubble, and is called first ratoons. . . . The second year it sprouts again, and is called second ratoons.
The Century, XXXV. 111.

2. The heart-leaves in a tobacco-plant. Imp. Dict.

ratoon (ra-tön'), v. i. [= Sp. retoñar, sprout or spring up anew; from the noun: see ratoon, n.] To sprout or send up new shoots from the root after being cropped or cut down: said of the sugar-cane and some other plants.

The cocos, cassavas, and sweet potatoes will ratoon in two or three years; the negro yams are a yearly crop, but the white yams will last in the ground for several years.
T. Roughley, Jamaica Planter's Guide, p. 317.

On the Upper Coast, above New Orleans, it is customary to let the stubble ratoon but once. In Cuba it often ratoons six successive years, but the cane becomes constantly more woody and poorer in saccharine matter.
The Century, XXXV. 111.

ratount, n. An obsolete form of ratten.

rat-pit (rat'pit), n. An inclosure in which rats are baited or killed. The object is to ascertain how many rats a dog can kill in a given time, or which of two or more dogs can kill them most rapidly.

rat-poison (rat'poi″zn), n. 1. Something used to poison rats with, as a preparation of arsenic. —2. A West African shrub, Dichapetalum toxicarium, whose seeds are used to destroy rats. The genus belongs to the Dichapetalaceæ, a small family allied to the Polygalaceæ. In the West Indies Hamelia patens is called rat-poison.

ratsbane (rats'bān), n. [< rat's, poss. of rat[1], + bane[1], as in henbane, etc.: see bane[1].] 1. Rat-poison. Arsenious acid is often so called.

Wherefore . . . you see by the example of the Romans that playes are ratsbane to government of common-weales.
Prynne, Histrio-Mastix, I., iv. 1.

We live like vermin here, and eat up your cheese—
Your mouldy cheese that none but rats would bite at;
Therefore 'tis just that ratsbane should reward us.
Fletcher, Sea Voyage, iv. 3.

2. A plant, Chailletia toxicaria. See rat-poison, 2.

ratsbane (rats'bān), v. t.; pret. and pp. ratsbaned, ppr. ratsbaning. [< ratsbane, n.] To poison with ratsbane.

rat-snake (rat'snāk), n. A colubrine serpent of the genus Ptyas, P. mucosus, a native of India, Ceylon, etc., attaining a length of 7 feet, frequently entering houses. Some similar snakes are also called by the same name.

rat's-tail (rats'tāl), n. 1. Same as rat-tail.—2. A slender rib or tongue tapering to a point, used to reinforce or stiffen a bar, plate, or the like, as on the back of a silver spoon.

ratt†, n. An obsolete form of rat[1].

rat-tail (rat'tāl), n. and a. I. n. In farriery: (a) An excrescence on a horse's leg, growing from the pastern to the shank. (b) A disease which causes the hair of a horse's tail to fall off; also, a horse's tail thus denuded of hair. Also rat's-tail.

II. a. Same as rat-tailed.—Rat-tail file, radish, etc. See the nouns.—Rat-tail maggot. See under rat-tailed.

rattail (rat'tāl), n. 1. A fish belonging to the genus Macrurus, as M. berglax; the onion-fish or grenadier. See cut under Macrurus.—2. A horse which has a tail bare or nearly bared of hair.—3. One of various plants which have tail-like flower-spikes, as the common plantain and the ribwort plantain, and various grasses, including species of Manisuris in the United States and Ischæmum nervosum in Australia.

rat-tailed (rat'tāld), a. 1. Having a tail like a rat's; having a rat-tail, as a horse.

Here comes the wonderful one-hoss shay,
Drawn by a rat-tailed, ewe-necked bay.
O. W. Holmes, The Deacon's Masterpiece.

2. Like a rat's tail in shape.—Rat-tailed kangaroo-rat, Hypsiprymnus murinus, an Australian marsupial.—Rat-tailed larva or maggot, the larva of certain syrphid flies, ending in a long slender stigmatophorous tail of two telescopic joints, forming an organ which enables the larva to breathe from the surface while lying hidden in mud, etc. The larva of Eristalis tenax is an example.—Rat-tailed serpent, Bothrops lanceolatus, a very venomous American pit-viper.—Rat-tailed shrew. See shrew.

Puparium and Fly of a rat-tailed maggot (Eristalis tenax). Line shows natural size of fly.

rattan[1], n. See ratten.

rattan[2], n. and v. See ratan.

rattan[3] (ra-tan'), n. [Imitative; cf. F. rataplan, imitation of the sound of a drum; cf. also rat-tat.] The continuous beat or reverberation of a drum; rataplan; rat-a-tat. [Rare.]

They had not proceeded far, when their ears were saluted with the loud rattan of a drum. W. H. Ainsworth.

rattanas (rat'a-nas), n. [Native name.] A kind of coarse sacking made in Madagascar and Mauritius.

rattany, n. See ratany.

rat-tat (rat-tat'), n. Same as rat-a-tat.

A breeze always blowing and playing rat-tat
With the bow of the ribbon round your hat.
Lowell, Appledore.

rat-tat-too (rat'tat-tö'), n. An intensified form of rat-a-tat.

The rat-tat-too of a drum was heard in the distance.
Philadelphia Times, Oct. 24, 1886.

ratteen (ra-tēn'), n. [Also rateen; = D. ratijn = G. Sw. Dan. ratin, < F. ratine, a kind of cloth, = Sp. Pg. ratina = It. rattina; origin uncertain; prob. (like F. rate, milt, spleen) so called from its loose cellular texture and likeness to a honeycomb, < LG. rate, honeycomb.] A kind of stuff, usually thick and resembling drugget or frieze: it is chiefly employed for linings.

ratten (rat'n), n. [Also rattan, ratton, rattin, rotten, rotton; < ME. raton, ratoun, ratone, < OF. (and F.) raton, a rat, = Sp. ratón, a mouse, < ML. rato(n-), a rat: see rat[1]. Cf. kitten as related to cat.] A rat. [Obsolete or prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Thanne ran ther a route of ratones, as it were,
And smale mys with hem mo than a thousand.
Piers Plowman (C), i. 165.

I comawnde alle the ratons that are here abowte,
That non dwelle in this place with-inne ne with-owte.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 23.

The bald rattons
Had eaten his yellow hair.
Young Bekie (Child's Ballads, IV. 11).

"A Yorkshire burr," he affirmed, "was as much better than a Cockney's lisp as a bull's bellow than a rattan's squeak." Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, p. 64.

ratten (rat'n), v. t. [< ratten, n. Cf. rat[1], v.] To play mischievous tricks upon, as an obnoxious person, for the purpose of coercion or intimidation. The members of a trades-union ratten a fellow-workman who refuses to join the union, to obey its behests, or to pay his dues, by secretly removing or breaking his tools or machinery, spoiling his materials, or the like, and ironically ascribing the mischief to rats. The practice was at one time prevalent in some of the manufacturing districts of Great Britain.

For enforcing payment of entrance-fees, contributions towards paying the fermes (dues), as well as of fines, the Craft-Gilds made use of the very means so much talked of in the case of the Sheffield Trade-Unions, namely rattening: that is, they took away the tools of their debtors.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. cxxvii.

A piece of sulphate of copper put into an indigo-vat throws it out of order, by oxidising the white indigo and sending it—in an insoluble state—to the bottom. This is a method of rattening not unknown in dye-works.
W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico-printing, p. 548.

Rattening, as defined by the Report of the Royal Commission, is "the abstraction of the workman's tools, so as to prevent him from earning his livelihood until he has obeyed the arbitrary orders of the union." It is satisfactory to know that this system . . . was chiefly confined to Sheffield and Manchester.
George Howell, Conflicts of Capital and Labor, vii. § 13.

rattener†, rattoner†, n. [< ME. ratoner, ratonere, rat-catcher, < OF. raton, a rat: see ratten.] A ratter or rat-catcher.

A rybidour and a ratoner, a rakere and hus knaue.
Piers Plowman (C), vii. 371.

ratter[1] (rat'ėr), n. [< rat[1], v., + -er[1].] 1. One who catches rats; a rat-catcher.—2. An animal which catches rats, as a terrier.

ratter[2] (rat'ėr), n. [< rat[1], v., 2, + -er[1].] One who rats, or becomes a renegade; also, a workman who renders himself obnoxious to a trades-union. See ratting, 2. [Colloq.]

The Essay on Faction is no less frank in its recognition of self-interest as a natural and prevailing motive, and almost cynical in its suppression of resentment against ratters and traitors. E. A. Abbott, Bacon, p. 84.

rat-terrier (rat'ter″i-ėr), n. A small active dog used to kill rats.

rattery (rat'ėr-i), n. [< ratter[2] + -y (see -ery).] The qualities or practices of a ratter; apostasy; tergiversation. [Rare.]

Such a spectacle refreshes me in the rattery and scoundrelism of public life.
Sydney Smith, Letters, 1822. (Davies.)

rattinet (rat-i-net'), n. [< F. ratine, a kind of cloth (see ratteen), + dim. -et.] A woolen stuff thinner than ratteen.

ratting (rat'ing), n. [Verbal n. of rat[1], v., 2.] 1. The act of deserting one's principles, and going over to the opposite party.—2. In the trades, the act of working for less than established or demanded prices, or of refusing to strike, or of taking the place of a striker.—3. A low sport consisting in setting a dog upon a number of rats confined in a tub, cage, or pit, to see how many he will kill in a given time.

rattish (rat'ish), a. [< rat[1] + -ish[1].] Characteristic of rats; having a rat-like character; like a rat.

rattle[1] (rat'l), v.; pret. and pp. rattled, ppr. rattling. [< ME. ratelen, rattle, clatter, etc., < AS. hrætelan* (cf. hrætelwyrt, 'rattlewort') = D. ratelen, rattle, = LG. rateln, räteln = MHG. razzeln, rage, roar, G. rasseln (> Dan. rasle = Sw. rasla), rattle; freq. of a simple verb seen in MHG. razzen, ratzen, rattle; perhaps akin to Gr. κραδαίνειν, swing, wave, brandish, shake; perhaps in part imitative (cf. rat-a-tat, rat-tat, in imitation of a knock at a door, rattan[3], F. rataplan, in imitation of a drum, etc.), and in so far comparable with Gr. κρότος, a rattling noise, κροτεῖν, knock, rattle, κρόταλον, a rattle, κροταλίζειν, rattle (see Crotalus, rattlesnake). Cf. dial. rackle, a var. of rattle. Hence ult. rail[4], Rallus, râle.] I. intrans. 1. To give out a rapid succession of short, sharp, jarring or clattering sounds; clatter, as by continuous concussions.

The quiver rattleth against him. Job xxxix. 23.

To the dread rattling thunder
Have I given fire, and rifted Jove's stout oak With his own bolt. Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 44.

"Farewell!" she said, and vanished from the place;
The sheaf of arrows shook, and rattled in the case.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., iii. 282.

Swift Astolpho to the rattling horn
His lips applies.
Hoole, tr. of Orlando Furioso, xxxiii.

One or two [rattlesnakes] coiled and rattled menacingly as I stepped near. T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXVI. 201.

2. To move or be carried along with a continuous rapid clatter; go or proceed or bear one's self noisily: often used with reference to speed rather than to the accompanying noise.

And off my mourning-robes; grief, to the grave;
For I haue gold, and therefore will be brave;
In silks I'll rattle it of every colour.
J. Cook, Green's Tu Quoque.

I'll take a good rattling gallop.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iv. 20.

Wagons . . . rattling along the hollow roads, and over the distant hills. Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 445.

We rattled away at a merry pace out of the town.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xiv.

3. To speak with noisy and rapid utterance; talk rapidly or in a chattering manner: as, to rattle on about trifles.

The rattling tongue
Of saucy and audacious eloquence.
Shak., M. N. D., v. 1. 102.

The girls are handsome, dashing women, without much information, but rattling talkers.
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 183.

II. trans. 1. To cause to make a rattling sound or a rapid succession of hard, sharp, or jarring sounds.

Her chain she rattles, and her whip she shakes.
Dryden.

Rattle his bones over the stones!
He's only a pauper whom nobody owns!
T. Noel, The Pauper's Drive.

2. To utter in sharp, rapid tones; deliver in a smart, rapid manner: as, to rattle off a string of names.

He rattles it out against Popery and arbitrary power.
Swift, Against Abolishing Christianity.

The rolls were rattled off; the short, crisp commands went forth. The Century, XXXVII. 466.

3. To act upon or affect by rattling sounds; startle or stir up by any noisy means.

Sound but another, and another shall
As loud as thine rattle the welkin's ear.
Shak., K. John, v. 2. 172.

These places [woodlands] are generally strongholds for foxes, and should be regularly rattled throughout the season. Encyc. Brit., XII. 395.

4. To scold, chide, or rail at noisily; berate clamorously.

If my time were not more precious
Than thus to lose it, I would rattle thee,
It may be beat thee.
Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, v. 3.

I to Mrs. Ann, and, Mrs. Jem being gone out of the chamber, she and I had a very high bout. I rattled her up, she being in bed; but, she becoming more cool, we parted pretty good friends. Pepys, Diary, Feb. 6, 1660.

5. To shake up, unsettle, or disturb by censure, annoyance, or irritation; bring into an agitated or confused condition. [Colloq. or slang.]

The king hath so rattled my lord-keeper that he is now the most pliable man in England.
Cottington, To Strafford (1633), quoted in Hallam's Const. [Hist., II. 89.

Unpleasant stories came into my head, and I remember repeating to myself more than once (candor is better than felicity of phrase), "Be careful, now; don't get rattled!" Atlantic Monthly, LXIV. 110.

rattle[1] (rat'l), n. [< ME. ratele, a rattle, < AS. hrætele*, in comp. hrætelwyrt, 'rattlewort,' a plant in whose pods the seeds rattle; = MD. ratele, D. ratel = G. rassel, a rattle; from the verb: see rattle[1], v. Cf. G. ratsche, a rattle, clapper; Sw. rassel, clank, clash, clatter, etc.]
1. A rapid succession of short, sharp, clattering sounds, as of intermitting collision or concussion.

I'll hold ten Pound my Dream is out;
I'd tell it to you but for the Rattle
Of those confounded Drums.
Prior, English Ballad on tr. of Boileau's Taking of Namur, [st. 10.

I aren't like a bird-clapper, forced to make a rattle when the wind blows on me. George Eliot, Adam Bede, liii.

2. A rattling clamor of words; sharp, rapid talk of any kind; hence, sharp scolding or railing.

This rattle in the crystal hall
Would be enough to deaf them all.
Cotton (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 218).

Receiving such a rattle for his former contempt by the Bishop of London that he came out blubbering.
Heylin, Life of Laud, p. 257. (Davies.)

I chid the servants and made a rattle.
Swift, Journal to Stella, lx.

3. An instrument or toy contrived to make a rattling sound. The watchman's rattle, formerly used for giving an alarm, and the child's toy resembling it, consist of a vibrating tongue slipping over the teeth of a rotating ratchet-wheel, and producing much noise when rapidly twirled by the handle. Other toy rattles for children, and those used by some primitive races for various purposes, commonly consist of a box or casing, or even a hollow gourd or shell, with or without a handle, containing loose pebbles or other hard objects.

The rattles of Isis and the cymbals of Brasilea nearly enough resemble each other. Raleigh.

They vse Rattles of the shell of a certaine fruite, in which they put Stones or Graines, and call them Maraca, of which they haue some superstitious conceit.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 837.

Behold the child, by Nature's kindly law,
Pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw.
Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 276.

4. One who talks rapidly and without moderation or consideration; a noisy, impertinent talker; a jabberer.

She had not been brought up to understand the propensities of a rattle, nor to know to how many idle assertions and impudent falsehoods the excess of vanity will lead.
Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, ix.

They call me their agreeable Rattle.
Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer.

It may seem strange that a man who wrote with so much perspicuity, vivacity, and grace should have been, whenever he took a part in conversation, an empty, noisy, blundering rattle. Macaulay, Goldsmith.

5. The crepitaculum of the true rattlesnake, consisting of a series of horny epidermic cells of an undulated pyramidal shape, articulated one within the other at the extremity of the tail. See rattlesnake.—6. (a) An annual herb, Rhinanthus Crista-galli, of meadows and pastures in Europe and northern Asia. It attaches itself by its fibrous roots to the roots of living grasses, etc., thus doing much damage. Its calyx in fruit is orbicular, inflated but flattened, containing a capsule of similar form with a few large flat, generally winged seeds. This is the common or yellow rattle, also called locally penny-grass, penny-rattle, rattlebags, rattlebox, and rattlepenny. (b) One of the Old World louseworts, Pedicularis palustris, the red rattle.—The rattles. ★(a) Croup. (b) The death-rattle.

rattle[2] (rat'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. rattled, ppr. rattling. [A back formation from rattling, a corruption of ratline but taken as a verbal noun in -ing, whence the assumed verb rattle.] Naut., to furnish with ratlines.—To rattle down, to seize or fasten ratlines on (the shrouds of a vessel).

rattlebags (rat'l-bagz), n. See rattle[1], 6 (a).

rattle-barrel (rat'l-bar″el), n. In founding, a tumbling-box for castings, used to free them from sand, and sometimes to remove the cores.

rattlebox (rat'l-boks), n. 1. A toy that makes a rattling noise; a rattle.—2. (a) A plant, the yellow rattle. See rattle[1], 6 (a). (b) Any of the North American species of Crotalaria; chiefly, C. sagittalis, a low herb of sandy soil in the eastern half of the United States. The seeds rattle in the inflated leathery pod. (c) The calico-wood, snowdrop-, or silverbell-tree, Mohrodendron Carolinum: from its dry fruit, which is bony within and contains a single seed in each of its 1 to 4 cells. See Halesia and calico-wood.

Plant, with Flowers and Pods, of Rattlebox (Crotalaria sagittalis).

rattlebrain (rat'l-brān), n. A giddy, chattering person; a rattlepate.

rattle-brained (rat'l-brānd), a. Giddy; chattering; whimsical; rattle-headed.

rattlebush (rat'l-bůsh), n. The wild indigo, Baptisia tinctoria, a bushy herb with inflated pods.

rattlecap (rat'l-kap), n. A giddy, volatile person; a madcap: generally said of a girl. [Colloq.]

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, ii. 13 [18].

rattlepate (rat'l-pāt), n. A noisy, empty fellow; a trifling or impertinent chatterer.

rattle-pated (rat'l-pā″ted), a. Same as rattle-headed.

rattler (rat'lėr), n. [< rattle[1] + -er[1].] 1. One who rattles, or talks away without reflection or consideration; a giddy, noisy person.—2. Anything which causes a person to become rattled, as a smart or stunning blow. [Slang or colloq.]

And once, when he did this in a manner that amounted to personal, I should have given him a rattler for himself if Mrs. Boffin had not thrown herself betwixt us.
Dickens, Our Mutual Friend.

3. A rattlesnake. [U. S.]

We have had rattlers killed every year; copperheads less frequently. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI. 85.

4. A big or bold lie. [Colloq.]—5. Among cutlers, a special form of razor with a very thin blade, the faces of which are ground to an angle of fifteen degrees.—Diamond rattler, the diamond rattlesnake.

rattleran (rat'l-ran), n. The lower half of a fore quarter of beef; a plate-piece. [U. S.]

rattleskull (rat'l-skul), n. Same as rattlepate.

rattlesnake (rat'l-snāk), n. [< rattle[1] + snake.] ★A venomous serpent of the family Crotalidæ, whose tail ends in a rattle or crepitaculum; a crotaliform or solenoglyphic serpent, or pit-viper, of either of the genera Crotalus and Crotalophorus. These poisonous reptiles are confined to America, where there are many species. Those whose head is covered on top with scales like those of the back belong to the genus Crotalus; others, with the top of the head plated, belong to Crotalophorus, Caudisona, or Sistrurus. The former are the larger species; both are equally venomous, in proportion to their size, and both have the pit between the eyes and nose characteristic of all the pit-vipers. (See cut under pit-viper.) The rattle is an epidermal or cuticular structure, representing the extreme of development of the horn or spine in which the tail of many other serpents ends. It consists of several hard horny pieces loosely articulated together, so that when rapidly vibrated they make a peculiar whirring or rattling noise. Rattlesnakes are sluggish and naturally inoffensive reptiles, only seeking to destroy their prey, like other animals. When alarmed or irritated they prepare to defend themselves by coiling in the attitude best adapted for striking with the fangs, at the same time sounding the warning rattle, during which process both the head and the tail are held erect. The snake can strike to a distance of about two thirds of its own length. The mechanism of the jaws is such that, when the mouth is wide open, the fangs are erected in position for piercing; and, when the mouth closes upon the wound the fangs have made in the flesh, a tiny stream of venom is spirted through each fang into the bitten part. (See cuts under Crotalus and poison-fang.) The poison, which is specially modified saliva, is secreted in a venom-gland near the angle of the jaw, and is conveyed by a venom-duct to the tooth. It is extremely dangerous, readily killing the small animals upon which the snake feeds, and is often fatal to man and other large animals. It has an acid reaction, neutralizable by an alkali, and is harmless when swallowed, if there is no lesion of the mucous membrane, though exceedingly poisonous when introduced into the circulation. The flesh of the rattlesnake is edible, and some animals, as hogs and peccaries, habitually feed upon these snakes. Among the best-known species are the banded and the diamond rattlesnakes, which inhabit eastern as well as other regions of the United States, and sometimes attain a length of 5 or 6 feet; many similarly large ones are found in the west, among them Crotalus pyrrhus, of a reddish color. The commonest species of the west is the Missouri rattlesnake, C. confluentus, very widely distributed from the British to the Mexican boundary. Among the smaller species are the massasauga, Crotalophorus tergeminus (Sistrurus catenatus), also known as the sidewiper, from its habit of wriggling obliquely. One species, C. cerastes, has a small horn over each eye.

rattlesnake-fern (rat'l-snāk-fėrn), n. One of the moonworts or grape-ferns, Botrychium Virginianum, found through a large part of North America and in the Old World. The sterile segment of the frond is broadly triangular, thin and finely divided, and of ample size or often reduced. The name is apparently from the resemblance of the fruit to the rattles of a rattlesnake.

rattlesnake-grass (rat'l-snāk-gràs), n. An American grass, Panicularia Canadensis, a handsome stout species with a large panicle of drooping spikelets, which are ovate, and flattish but turgid, like those of Briza, the quaking-grass. It is a useful forage-grass in wet places. Sometimes called tall quaking-grass.

rattlesnake-herb (rat'l-snāk-ėrb), n. The baneberry or cohosh. See Actæa.

rattlesnake-master (rat'l-snāk-mās″tėr), n. One of several American plants at some time reputed to cure the bite of the rattlesnake. (a) The false aloe, Agave Virginica, said to be so called in South Carolina. A tincture of this plant is sometimes used for flatulent colic. (b) According to Pursh, Lacinaria scariosa and L. squarrosa, in Virginia, Kentucky, and the Carolinas. (c) A species of eringo, Eryngium yuccifolium, also called, like Lacinaria, button-snake-root; but the plants are quite unlike. See the generic names.

Rattlesnake-master (Eryngium yuccifolium). 1, upper part of the stem with the heads; 2, a leaf; a, a flower, with the bract.

rattlesnake-plantain (rat'l-snāk-plan″tān), n. Any one of the three American species of Peramium. See Goodyera.

rattlesnake-root (rat'l-snāk-röt), n. A plant, Nabalus serpentarius, also N. albus and N. altissimus, the first at least having some repute in North Carolina, etc., as a remedy for snake-bites. See Prenanthes and cancer-weed.

Rattlesnake-root (Nabalus albus). 1, the inflorescence; 2, lower part of stem with root; a, a head, after anthesis; b, the achenium with the pappus.

rattlesnake-weed (rat'l-snāk-wēd), n. A hawkweed, Hieracium venosum, of the eastern half of the United States. It has a slender stem a foot or two high, forking above into a loose corymb of a few yellow heads. The leaves, which are marked with purple veins, are situated mostly at the base. These and the root are thought to possess an astringent virtue.

rattletrap (rat'l-trap), n. A shaky, rattling object; especially, a rattling, rickety vehicle; in the plural, objects clattering or rattling against each other. [Colloq.]

Hang me if I'd ha' been at the trouble of conveying her and her rattle-traps last year across the channel.
Mrs. Gore, Castles in the Air, xxxiv.

"He'd destroy himself, and me too, if I attempted to ride him at such a rattletrap as that." A rattletrap! The quintain that she had put up with so much anxious care.
Trollope, Barchester Towers, viii.

rattleweed (rat'l-wēd), n. A plant of the genus Astragalus, in numerous species. It includes various loco-weeds, and is presumably extended to Aragallus in the Rocky Mountain region.

rattlewing (rat'l-wing), n. The golden-eyed duck, or whistlewing, Clangula glaucion. Also called whistler. [Eng.]

rattlewort (rat'l-wėrt), n. [Not found in ME.; < AS. hrætelwyrt, rattlewort, < hrætele*, a rattle, + wyrt, wort: see rattle[1], wort[1].] A plant of the genus Crotalaria. Compare rattle-box, 2 (b).

rattling[1] (rat'ling), n. [Verbal n. of rattle[1], v.] 1. The act of making a rattle, clatter, or continuous jarring noise.

The noise of a whip, and the noise of the rattling of the wheels, and of the prancing horses, and of the jumping chariots. Nahum iii. 2.

2. The act of berating or railing at or otherwise assailing or attacking: as, to give one a rattling.

rattling[1] (rat'ling), p. a. [Ppr. of rattle[1], v.] 1. Making or adapted for making a rattle; hence, smart; sharp; lively in action, movement, or manners: as, a rattling rider; a rattling pace; a rattling game; a rattling girl.

He ance tell'd me . . . that the Psalms of David were excellent poetry! as if the holy Psalmist thought o' rattling rhymes in a blether, like his ain silly clinkum-clankum things that he ca's verse. Scott, Rob Roy, xxi.

2. Bewilderingly large or conspicuous: as, rattling stakes or bets. [Colloq. or slang.]

rattling[2] (rat'ling), n. A corruption of ratline.

ratton, n. See ratten.

rattoner†, n. See rattener.

rattoon[1], n. See ratoon.

rattoon[2]†, n. Same as ratan.

rat-trap (rat'trap), n. A trap for catching rats; ★also, something resembling or suggesting such a trap.—Rat-trap pedal. See pedal.

rauchwacke (râk'wak; G. pron. rouch'vä″ke), n. [G., < rauch, smoke (= E. reek), + wacke, a sort of stone consisting of quartz, sand, and mica: see wacke. Cf. graywacke.] Dolomite or dolomitic limestone, containing many small irregular cavities, frequently lined with crystals of brown-spar: a characteristic mode of occurrence of the Zechstein division of the Permian in various parts of Germany.

raucid (râ'sid), a. [< L. raucidus*, LL. dim. raucidulus, hoarse, < raucus, hoarse: see raucous.] Same as raucous.

Methinks I hear the old boatman [Charon] paddling by the weedy wharf, with raucid voice, bawling "sculls."
Lamb, To the Shade of Elliston.

raucity (râ'si-ti), n. [< F. raucité, hoarseness, < L. raucita(t-)s, hoarseness, also snoring, < raucus, hoarse: see raucous.] Roughness or harshness of utterance; hoarseness.

The purling of a wreathed string, and the raucity of a trumpet. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 700.

raucle (râ'kl), a. [A var. of rackel, rackle, rash, fearless, also stout, firm, strong: see rackle, rakel.] Coarse; harsh; strong; firm; bold. [Scotch.]

Auld Scotland has a raucle tongue.
Burns, Prayer to the Scotch Representatives.

raucous (râ'kus), a. [= F. rauque = Pr. rauc, rauch = Cat. ronc = Sp. ronco, rauco = Pg. rouco = It. rauco, < L. rcucus, hoarse; cf. Skt. √ ru, cry out.] Hoarse; harsh; croaking in sound: as, a raucous voice or cry.

raucously (râ'kus-li), adv. In a raucous manner; with a croaking sound; hoarsely.

raught[2]†. An obsolete preterit and past participle of reck.

raun (rân), n. A dialectal form of roe[2].

raunce†, n. See rance[3].

raunceount†, v. t. A Middle English form of ransom.

raunch (rânch), v. t. Same as ranch[1].

raunson†, raunsount†, n. and v. Middle English forms of ransom.

rauracienne (rō-ras-ien′), n. In dyeing, same as orseillin.

Rausan (F. pron. rō-zoṅ′), n. [F.: see def.] A wine of Bordeaux, of the commune of Margaux: its best variety is the wine of Château Rausan, often exported under the name of Rausan-Margaux.

Rauvolfia (rau-vol'fi-ą), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), named after Leonhard Rauwolf, a German botanist and traveler of the sixteenth century.] A genus of sympetalous plants of the family Apocynaceæ, the dogbane family, tribe Plumerieæ, and type of the subtribe Rauvolfieæ. It is characterized by a salver-shaped corolla with included stamens, an annular or cup-shaped disk, and an ovary with two carpels, each with two ovules, in fruit becoming drupaceous and united, often beyond the middle. There are about 45 species, natives of the tropics in America, Asia, and Africa, also in South Africa. They are trees or shrubs, commonly with smooth whorled leaves which are three or four in a circle, and finely and closely feather-veined. The small flowers and fruit are in cymose clusters which become lateral and commonly resemble umbels. Most species are actively poisonous; some, as R. tetraphylla, are in repute as cathartics and emetics. Several medicinal species, with remarkably twisted roots and stems, were formerly separated as a genus Ophioxylon (Linnæus, 1753), on account of their producing both sterile flowers with two stamens and fertile flowers with five: as R. serpentina, the East Indian serpentwood, a climber with handsome leaves, the root of which is used in India and China as a febrifuge. R. Sandwicensis, the hao of the Hawaiians, a small milky tree with white scarred branches, is unlike all other species in its leafy sepals.

ravage (rav'ąj), n. [< F. ravage, ravage, havoc, spoil, < ravir, bear away suddenly: see ravish.] Desolation or destruction wrought by the violent action of men or beasts, or by physical or moral causes; devastation; havoc; waste; ruin: as, the ravage of a lion; the ravages of fire or tempest; the ravages of an invading army; the ravages of passion or grief.

Would one think 'twere possible for love
To make such ravage in a noble soul? Addison.

And many another suppliant crying came
With noise of ravage wrought by beast and man.
Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

=Syn. Pillage, plunder, spoliation, despoilment. These words all apply not to the treatment of people directly, but to the destruction or appropriation of property.

ravage (rav'ąj), v. t.; pret. and pp. ravaged, ppr. ravaging. [< F. ravager, ravage; from the noun.] To desolate violently; lay waste, as by force, storm, etc.; commit havoc on; devastate; pillage; despoil.

Cæsar
Has ravaged more than half the globe, and sees Mankind grown thin by his destructive sword.
Addison, Cato i. 1.

While oft in whirls the mad tornado flies,
Mingling the ravaged landscape with the skies.
Goldsmith, Des. Vil., l. 358.

=Syn. To plunder, waste. See the noun.

ravager (rav'ąj-ėr), n. [< F. ravageur, < ravager, ravage: see ravage.] One who ravages; a plunderer; a spoiler; one who or that which lays waste.

The plumage is entirely black, with more or less lustrous or metallic sheen; the bill and feet are ebony-black; the wings are pointed, the tail is rounded, and the nostrils are concealed beneath large tufts of antrorse plumules. The voice is raucous. The common raven is C. corax, about Raven (Corvus corax).

2 feet long and 50 inches in extent of wings. It inhabits Europe, Asia, and some other regions, and the American birds are considered as forming two subspecies, Corvus corax principalis, the northern and eastern form, and C. c. sinuatus of the southwest. A distinct species is C. cryptoleucus of western North America, with the concealed bases of the feathers of the neck snowy-white. Ravens make very intelligent pets, but are thievish and troublesome. They may be taught to imitate speech to some extent. In the wild state the raven is omnivorous, like the crow; it nests on trees, rocks, and cliffs, preferring the most inaccessible places, and lays four or five greenish eggs heavily speckled with brown and blackish shades. The American raven is now almost unknown in the eastern parts of the United States, but is still abundant in the west. Ravens have from time immemorial been viewed with superstitious dread, being supposed to bring bad luck and forebode death.

Musaceæ, the banana family. It is characterized by a loculicidally three-valved and three-celled capsule with numerous seeds in six rows, and by separate long and narrow sepals and petals, three of each, all similar and unappendaged. There are but 2 species, natives one of Madagascar, the other of northern Brazil and Guiana. In both the stem is sometimes short, with the leaves almost all radical, at other times forming a tall woody trunk reaching 30 feet high, ringed by leaf-scars. The handsome oblong and two-ranked leaves resemble those of the banana, and are of immense size, being considered the largest undivided leaves known, with the exception perhaps of the Victoria lily. The long concave leafstalks are divided within into small cubical chambers, about a half-inch square, filled with a clear watery sap which forms a refreshing drink, whence the name traveler's-tree, used in botanic gardens for R. Madagascariensis. The leaves are also used as a thatch for the native huts. The large flowers form a short many-flowered raceme within the spathe, and are followed by woody capsules and edible seeds with a lacerate and pulpy blue aril which yields an essential oil. See traveler's-tree.

krūvĭ, Lith. kraújas, blood.] I. a. 1. Existing in the state of natural growth or formation; unchanged in constitution by subjection to heat or other alterative agency; uncooked, or chemically unaltered: as, raw meat, fish, oysters, etc.; most fruits are eaten raw; raw medicinal substances; raw (that is, unburnt) umber.

Distilled waters will last longer than raw waters.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 347.

On this brown, greasy napkin . . . lie the raw vegetables she is preparing for domestic consumption.
H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 165.

2. In an unchanged condition as regards some process of fabrication; unwrought or unmanufactured. In this sense raw is used either of substances in their primitive state, or of partly or wholly finished products fitted for working into other forms, according to the nature of the case: as, the raw materials of a manufacture, raw silk or cotton (the prepared fiber); raw marble; raw clay.

Eight thousand bailes of raw silke are yearly made in the Island. Sandys, Travailes, p. 192.

Like a cautious man of business, he was not going to speak rashly of a raw material in which he had had no experience. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, iii. 5.

It [the German mind] has supplied the raw material in almost every branch of science for the defter wits of other nations to work on.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 293.

3. In a rudimental condition; crude in quality or state; primitively or coarsely constituted; unfinished; untempered; coarse; rough; harsh.

Her lips were, like raw lether, pale and blew.
Spenser, F. Q., V. xii. 29.

The coast scene of Hoguet . . . copied in water-color, . . . and blind-haltered with a blazing space of raw-white all around it. The Nation, Feb., 1875, p. 84.

The raw vessels fresh from the wheel, which only require a moderate heat to prepare them for being glazed, are piled in the highest chamber. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 638.

The glycerine is of a brownish colour and known as raw, in which state it is sold for many purposes.
Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 310.

4. Harshly sharp or chilly, as the weather; bleak, especially from cold moisture; characterized by chilly dampness.

Once, upon a raw and gusty day. Shak., J. C., i. 2. 100.

Dreadful to me was the coming home in the raw twilight, with nipped fingers and toes.
Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, i.

A raw mist rolled down upon the sea.
B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 15.

5. Crude or rude from want of experience, skill, or reflection; of immature character or quality; awkward; untrained; unfledged; ill-instructed or ill-considered: said of persons and their actions or ideas.

No newelie practised worshippinges alloweth he for hys, but vtterlye abhorreth them all as thinges rawe and unsauerye. Bp. Bale, Image, ii.

An opinion hath spread itself very far in the world, as if the way to be ripe in faith were to be raw in wit and judgment. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 8.

I have within my mind
A thousand raw tricks of these bragging Jacks,
Which I will practise. Shak., M. of V., iii. 4. 77.

He had also a few other raw Seamen, but such as would have made better Landmen, they having served the King of Siam as Soldiers. Dampier, Voyages, II. i. 112.

His [Sherman's] division was at that time wholly raw, no part of it ever having been in an engagement.
U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 338.

6. Looking like raw meat, as from lividness or removal of the skin; deprived or appearing destitute of the natural integument: as, a raw sore; a raw spot on a horse.

His cheeke-bones raw, and eie-pits hollow grew,
And brawney armes had lost their knowen might.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. xii. 20.

When raw flesh appeareth in him [a leper], he shall be unclean. Lev. xiii. 14.

Since yet thy cicatrice looks raw and red
After the Danish sword. Shak., Hamlet, iv. 3. 62.

7. Feeling sore, as from abrasion of the skin; harshly painful; galled.

And all his sinews waxen weak and raw
Through long imprisonment.
Spenser, F. Q., I. x. 2.

Sec. Gent. Have you no fearful dreams?
Steph. Sometimes, as all have
That go to bed with raw and windy stomachs.
Fletcher, Pilgrim, iii. 7.

8. In ceram., unbaked—that is, either fresh from the potters' wheel or the mold, or merely dried without the use of artificial heat.—Raw edge, that edge of any textile fabric which is not finished with a selvage, nor hemmed or bound or otherwise secured, and which is therefore liable to ravel out.—Raw hide. See hide[2] and rawhide.—Raw material oil, sienna, silk, etc. See the nouns.=Syn. Raw, Crude. These words, the same in ultimate origin and in earlier meaning, have drawn somewhat apart. Raw continues to apply to food which is not yet cooked, as raw potatoes; but crude has lost that meaning. Raw is applied to material not yet manufactured, as cotton, silk; crude rather to that which is not refined, as petroleum, or matured, as a theory or an idea.

II. n. 1. A raw article, material, or product. Specifically—(a) An uncooked oyster, or an oyster of a kind preferred for eating raw: as, a plate of raws. [Colloq.] (b) Raw sugar. [Colloq. or trade use.]

The stock of raws on hand on the 31st of December, 1884, amounted to 1,000,000 kilograms.
U. S. Cons. Rep., No. lx. (1886), p. 96.

2. A raw, galled, or sore place; an established sore, as on a horse; hence, soreness or sensitiveness of feeling or temper. [Colloq.]

Like savage hackney coachmen, they know where there is a raw. De Quincey. (Webster.)

It's a tender subject, and every one has a raw on it.
Lever, Davenport Dunn.

Here is Baynes, . . . in a dreadfully wicked, murderous, and dissatisfied state of mind. His chafing, bleeding temper is one raw; his whole soul one rage and wrath.
Thackeray, Philip, xxvii.

3. In bot., same as rag[1], 3 (b). [Prov. Eng.]—To touch one on the raw, to irritate one by alluding to or joking him about any matter in respect to which he is especially sensitive.

raw[2] (râ), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of row[2].

Clavers and his Highlandmen Came down upo' the raw.
Battle of Killiecrankie (Child's Ballads, VII. 153).

rawbone† (râ′bōn), a. [< raw[1] + bone, n.] Same as raw-boned. Spenser, F. Q., IV. v. 34.

raw-boned (râ′bōnd), a. Having little flesh on the bones; lean and large-boned; gaunt.

Lean raw-boned rascals! who would e'er suppose
They had such courage and audacity?
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., i. 2. 35.

rawhead (râ′hed), n. 1. A specter; a nursery bugbear of frightful aspect, usually coupled with bloody-bones.

I was told before
My face was bad enough; but now I look Like Bloody-Bone and Raw-Head, to fright children.
Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, iv. 4.

The indiscretion of servants, whose usual method is to awe children, and keep them in subjection, by telling them of raw-head and bloody-bones.
Locke, Education, § 138.

2. The cream which rises on the surface of raw milk, or milk that has not been heated. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

rawhide (râ′hīd), n. and a. [< raw[1] + hide[1], n.] I. n. 1. The material of untanned skins of cattle, very hard and tough when twisted in strips for ropes or the like, and dried.—2. A riding-whip made of twisted rawhide.

II. a. Made of rawhide: as, a rawhide whip.

rawish (râ′ish), a. [< raw[1] + -ish[1].] Somewhat raw; rather raw, in any sense of that word.

The rawish dank of clumsy winter.
Marston, Prol. to Antonio's Revenge.

rawly (râ′li), adv. 1. In a raw, crude, unfinished, immature, or untempered manner; crudely; roughly.

Nothing is so prosaic as the rawly new.
W. W. Story, Roba di Roma, i.

2†. In an unprepared or unprovided state.

Some crying for a surgeon, some upon their wives left poor behind them, some upon the debts they owe, some upon their children rawly left. Shak., Hen. V., iv. 1. 147.

rawness (râ′nes), n. [< ME. rawenes, rawnesse, rownes; < raw[1] + -ness.] 1. The state or quality of being raw, in any sense.

Of what Comodity such vse of arte wilbe in our tounge may partely be seene by the scholasticall rawnesse of some newly Commen from the vniuersities.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 2.

Much if not most of this rawness in the use of English must come, not merely from defective training in schools, but from defective training at home.
The Nation, XLVIII. 392.

2†. Unprepared or precipitate manner; want of provision or foresight.

Why in that rawness left you wife and child, . . .
Without leave-taking? Shak., Macbeth, iv. 3. 26.

rawnsake†, v. t. An old form of ransack.

raw-port (râ′pōrt), n. A port-hole in a small sailing vessel through which in a calm an oar can be worked.

raw-pot (râ′pot), n. A young crow. [Local, Irish.]

The crows . . . feeding the young rawpots that kicked up such a bobbery in their nests wid hunger.
Mrs. S. C. Hall, Sketches of Irish Char., p. 36.

rax (raks), v. [< ME. raxen, roxen, rasken, rosken, stretch oneself, < AS. racsan, raxan*, stretch oneself after sleep; with formative -s (as in cleanse, rinse, etc.), from the root of rack[1], stretch: see rack[1].] I. trans. To stretch, or stretch out; reach out; reach or attain to; extend the hand to; hand: as, rax me ower the pitcher. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

He raise, and raxed him where he stood,
And bade him match him with his marrows.
Raid of the Reidswire (Child's Ballads, VI. 134).

When ye gang to see a man that never did ye nae ill raxing a halter [that is, hanging].
Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, v.

So he raxes his hand across t' table, an' mutters summat as he grips mine. Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xliii.

II. intrans. To perform the act of reaching or stretching; stretch one's self; reach for or try to obtain something. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

raxle†, v. i. [ME. raxlen, roxlen, rasclen, a var. or freq. of raxen, stretch: see rax.] To stretch one's self; rouse up from sleep. Compare rax.

I raxled & fel in gret affray [after a dream].
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), i. 1173.

Benedicite he by-gan with a bolke and hus brest knokede, Rascled and remed and routte at the laste.
Piers Plowman (C), viii. 7.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The dark, unfathomed caves of ocean bear.
Gray, Elegy.

2. A beam of intellectual light.

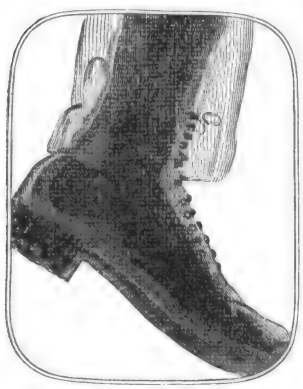
A ray of reason stole Half through the solid darkness of his soul.
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 225.



3. A stripe; streak; line.

Wrought with little raies, streames, or streaks.
Baret, Alvearie, 1580.

4. In geom., an unlimited straight line. As it is desirable to give the line different names according as it is conceived (1) as a locus of points, (2) as an intersection of planes, or (3) as an element of a plane, in 1865 the practice was begun of calling the unlimited straight line considered as a locus of points a ray. But as it was found that the word did not readily suggest that idea, owing to other associations, the practice was changed, and the line so considered is now called a range, while the word ray is taken to mean an unlimited straight line as an element of a plane. In older geometrical writings ray is synonymous with radius, while a line considered as a radial emanation is called a beam.

5. In bot.: (a) One of the branches or pedicels in an umbel. (b) The marginal part as opposed to the central part or disk in a head, umbel, or other flower-cluster, when there is a difference of structure, as in many Compositæ and in wild hydrangeas. (c) A ray-flower. (d) A radius. See medullary rays, under medullary.—6. One of the ray-like processes or arms of the Radiata, as of a starfish; a radiated or radiating part or organ; an actinomere. See cuts under Asterias and Asteriidæ.—7. One of the hard spinous or soft jointed processes which support and serve to extend the fin of a fish; a part of the skeleton of the fin; specifically, one which is articulated, thus contradistinguished from a hard or inarticulated one called specifically a spine; a fin-ray.—8. In entom., one of the longitudinal nervures or veins of an insect's wing.—9. pl. In her.: (a) Long indentations or dents by which a heraldic line is broken, whether dividing two parts of the escutcheon or bounding any ordinary. Compare radiant, 3 (a). (b) A representation of rays, whether issuing from the sun or from a corner of the escutcheon, a cloud, or an ordinary. They are sometimes straight, sometimes waving, and sometimes alternately straight and waving; it is in the last form that they are usually represented when surrounding the sun.—Branchial ray, branchiostegal rays. See the adjectives.—Calorific rays, heat-rays. See heat and spectrum.—Cone of rays. See cone.—Deviation of a ray of light. See deviation.—Direct rays. See direct illumination, under direct.—Divergent rays. See divergent.

— Extraordinary ray. See refraction. — Herschelian rays of the spectrum. See Herschelian. — Medullary rays. (a) See medullary. (b) Bundles of straight or collecting tubules of the kidney contained in the cortex; the pyramids of Ferrein. See tubule. — Obscure rays. See obscure and spectrum. — Ordinary ray. See refraction. — Principal ray. See principal. — Ritteric rays. See Ritteric. — Visual rays. See visual. — Cathode rays, a form of radiation generated in a vacuum-tube, in connection with the cathode, or negative pole, when an electric discharge is passed through it. — X-rays, or Röntgen rays, a form of radiation having characteristic and distinctive properties, discovered by Professor Wilhelm Konrad Röntgen, of Würzburg (announced by him in December, 1895). He showed that the discharge of a large Ruhmkorff coil through a vacuum-tube produces a form of radiation external to the latter, which has the property of causing various substances to fluoresce; of affecting the ordinary photographic plate like light (though itself invisible); and of penetrating opaque bodies in various degrees, according to their density and relative thickness, platinum, lead, and silver being quite opaque, while aluminium, wood, and paper are quite transparent. He also found that these rays are not refracted by prisms of carbon disulphid, and that uncertain refraction occurs with vulcanized rubber prisms and those made of aluminium; that powdered substances, opaque to white light, are quite as transparent to these rays as solid bodies of equal mass; and that bodies having rough surfaces act like those whose surfaces are polished. These facts forced him to conclude that refraction and regular reflection do not exist, but that such bodies behave to X-rays as muddy media to light. Other conclusions were that these rays pass through all substances at the same speed; that air absorbs a very much smaller part of them than of cathode rays; that they are not deflected by a magnet; that the spot on the wall of the tube which fluoresces most decidedly is to be regarded as the principal point of their radiation; that when the cathode rays are deflected within the tube, the spot is changed, thus producing a new source of radiation; that, therefore, cathode rays and X-rays are not identical; that X-rays are rectilinearly propagated; that no interference phenomena of X-rays were found to exist; that the above facts tend to show that they have properties not hitherto known in connection with ultra-violet, visible, and infra-red light; and that, therefore, they do not consist of transverse vibrations of the ether, but of longitudinal vibrations. The source of X-rays has been shown to be the surface upon which the cathode rays first strike, whether that surface be the wall of the tube or an object placed within the tube; when this object within the tube is the anode itself, the emanations are most powerful. It has also been found that X-rays have the property, in common with ultra-violet light, of dispersing negative charges on insulated surfaces and the power of positively electrifying such surfaces; and that regular reflection, though weak, may be demonstrated by the use of the photographic plate and long exposure. Hertz had previously shown that cathode rays penetrate opaque bodies, and Lenard that such rays may pass through aluminium forming a part of the wall of the tube and affect the photographic plate, but that their absorption is excessive beyond a few millimeters from the aluminium window.

ray[6] (rā), n. [Origin obscure.] A certain disease of sheep, also called scab, shab, or rubbers.

ray[7]†, n. Same as roy.

Raya[1], Rayah (rä'yä), n. [= F. rayah, raïa, < Ar. raiya, pl ra'āyā, people, peasants, subjects, cattle, < ra'a, pasture, feed; cf. rāaya, flocks, herds. Cf. ryot, ult. the same word.] Any subject of the Sultan of Turkey who is not a Mohammedan.

raya[2] (rä'yä), n. [E. Ind.] An Indian broad-throat of the family Eurylæmidæ, Psarisomus dalhousiæ, inhabiting the Himalayas. The term is also one of the several generic designations which this species has received.

Rayah, n. See Raya[1].

rayat, rayatwari. See ryot, ryotwar.

rayed (rād), a. [< ME. rayed, rayyd, rayid; < ray[1] + -ed[2].] 1. Having rays or ray-like processes, as a flower-head or an animal; specifically, in zoöl., radiate. — 2. Having rays (of this or that kind): as, a many-rayed fin; a soft-rayed fish. — 3†. Striped.

> The sheriffs of London should give yearly rayed gowns to the recorder, chamberlain, etc.
> Archæologia, XXXIX. 367.

Rayed animals. See Radiata.

rayey (rā'i), a. [< ray[1] + -ey = -y[1].] Having or consisting of rays.

> The rayey fringe of her faire eyes. Cotton, Song.

ray-floret (rā'flō"ret), n. A ray-flower: used chiefly of the Asteraceæ.

ray-flower (rā'flou"ėr), n. One of the flowers which collectively form the ray (see ray[1], 5 (b)); most often, one from the circle of ligulate flowers surrounding a disk of tubular flowers in the heads of many Asteraceæ.

ray-grass (rā'gras), n. A good forage-grass, Lolium perenne. Also rye-grass.

rayket, rayle†. See rake[2], rail.

rayless (rā'les), a. [< ray[1] + -less.] 1. Without rays or radiance; unillumined; lightless; dark; somber; gloomy. Young, Night Thoughts, i. 19. — 2. In bot. and zoöl., having no rays or ray-like parts.

raymet†, v. i. A Middle English form of roam.

Raynaud's disease. See disease.

Raynaud's gangrene. Same as Raynaud's disease.

rayne[1]†, rayne[2]†. See rain[1], reign.

ray-oil (rā'oil), n. Oil prepared from the livers of batoid fishes or rays.

rayon† (rā'on), n. [< F. rayon, a ray, beam, < rais, a ray: see ray[1].] A beam or ray. Spenser, Visions of Bellay (ed. 1591), ii.

rayonnant (rā'o-nant), a. [< F. rayonnant, ppr. of rayonner, radiate, shine, < rayon, a ray: see rayon.] Radiating; arranged in the direction of rays issuing from a center. Decoration is often said to be rayonnant when, as in the case of a round dish or other circular object, the surface is divided into panels growing larger as they approach the circumference, and bounded by the radii and by arcs of larger and smaller circles.

rayonned (rā'ond), a. [< rayon + -ed[2].] Same as rayonnant raze[1] (rāz), v. t. See rase[1].

raze[2]†, n. An obsolete form of race[4].

raze[3] (rāz), n. [Origin obscure.] A swinging fence set up in a watercourse to prevent the passage of cattle. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

razed (rāzd), p. a. [Pp. of raze[1], v.] In her., same as ragged, 7.

razee (ra-zē'), n. [< F. rasé, cut down (vaisseau rasé, a vessel cut down), pp. of raser, shave, rase: see rase[1], raze[1].] A ship of war cut down to a smaller size by reducing the number of decks.

razee (ra-zē'), v. t. [< razee, n.] To cut down or reduce to a lower class, as a ship; hence, to lessen or abridge by cutting out parts: as, to razee a book or an article.

razor (rā'zor), n. [Early mod. E. also rasour, raser; < ME. rasour, rasoure, rasowre, rasure, a razor, < OF. (and F.) rasoir = Pr. razor = OCat. rasó = It. rasoio, < ML. rasorium, a razor (cf. rasorius, razor-fish), < L. radere, pp. rasus, scrape, shave: see rase[1], raze[1].] 1. A sharp-edged instrument used for shaving the face or head. The blade is usually made with a thick rounded back, sides hollowed or sloping to a very thin edge, and a tang by which it is pivoted to and swings freely in a two-leafed handle. The tang has a prolongation by the aid of which the razor is firmly grasped and controlled. There are also razors formed on the principle of the carpenters' plane, by the use of which the risk of cutting the skin is avoided. In Eastern countries razors are made with an immovable handle continuous with the blade. Compare rattler, 5.

Cross-sections of Razors.

a and b, ordinary forms; c, section known as "half-rattler"; d, backed razor.

2. A tusk: as, the razors of a boar. Johnson. — Occam's razor, the principle that the unnecessary supposition that things of a peculiar kind exist, when the observed facts may be equally well explained on the supposition that no such things exist, is unwarranted (Entia non sunt multiplicanda præter necessitatem). So called after William of Occam (died about 1349); but, as a historical fact, Occam does not make much use of this principle, which belongs rather to the contemporary nominalist William Durand de St. Pourçain (died 1332).

razorable† (rā'zor-a-bl), a. [< razor + -able.] Fit to be shaved.

> Till new-born chins
> Be rough and razorable.
> Shak., Tempest, ii. 1. 250.

razorback (rā'zor-bak), n. 1. A rorqual, finfish, or finner-whale, of the family Balænopteridæ. — 2. A hog whose back has somewhat the form of a sharp ridge. This formation, accompanied by long legs, is characteristic of breeds of hogs that have long been allowed to run wild in woods and waste places and feed upon mast, wild fruits, etc. The flesh of such swine, particularly that of the hams, is usually of superior quality for the table.

razor-backed (rā'zor-bakt), a. 1. Having a sharp back; hog-backed: as, the razor-backed buffalo, a fish, Ictiobus urus, of the Mississippi valley. — 2. Having a long sharp dorsal fin which cuts the water like a razor, as the rorqual.

razorbill (rā'zor-bil), n. 1. The razor-billed auk, or tinker, Alca or Utamania torda, so called from the deep, compressed, and trenchant bill. The bill is feathered for about one half its length, in the rest of its extent being vertically furrowed, and hooked at the tip; one of the furrows is white, the bill being otherwise black, like the feet; the mouth is yellow. The plumage is black on the upper parts, the lower parts from the neck in summer, and from the bill in winter, being white; there is a narrow white line from the bill to the eye, and the tips of the secondaries are white. The bird is about 18 inches long, and 27 in extent of wings. It inhabits arctic and northerly regions of both hemispheres, subsists chiefly on fish, and nests on rocky sea-coasts, laying a single egg about 3 by 2 inches, white or whitish, spotted and blotched with different shades of brown. The flesh is eatable.

Razorbill (Alca torda), in winter plumage.

2. The skimmer or cutwater, Rhynchops nigra. See skimmer and Rhynchops.

razor-billed (rā′zȯr-bild), a. Having a bill likened to a razor in any way: specifically noting certain birds.—Razor-billed auk. See razorbill, 1.—Razor-billed curassow, a bird of the genus Mitua, as M. tuberosa of Guiana.

razorblade (rā′zȯr-blād), n. A long, slim oyster. [Connecticut.]

razor-clam (rā′zȯr-klam), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Solenidæ, especially of the genera Ensis, Solen, or Siliqua; a razor-fish or razor-shell: so called from its shape. See cut under Ensis.

razor-fish (rā′zȯr-fish), n. 1. A fish of the family Labridæ, Xyrichthys psittacus, of the West Indies, occasional on the southern coast of the United States.—2. A related fish, Xyrichthys novacula, of the Mediterranean.—3. A razor-clam: so called from the shape of the shell, which resembles a razor. The common razor-fish of Great Britain is Ensis siliqua, also called spout-fish and razor-shell. Siliqua patula is a Californian species, used for food.

razor-grass (rā′zȯr-gràs), n. A West Indian nut-rush, Scleria pterota, with formidable cutting leaves.

razor-grinder (rā′zȯr-grīn″dėr), n. The nightjar: same as grinder, 3.

razor-hone (rā′zȯr-hōn), n. A fine hone used for sharpening or setting razors. See hone[1].

razor-paper (rā′zȯr-pā″pėr), n. Smooth unsized paper coated on one side with a composition of powdered crocus and emery, designed as a substitute for a strop.

razor-paste (rā′zȯr-pāst), n. A paste of emery-powder or the like, for spreading on the surface of a razor-strop to give it its sharpening property.

razor-shell (rā′zȯr-shel), n. The shell of a razor-fish; a bivalve mollusk of the genera Ensis, Solen, or Siliqua: so called from the shape of the shell, which resembles a razor. Compare razor-fish, 3.

razor-stone (rā′zȯr-stōn), n. Same as novaculite.

razor-strop (rā′zȯr-strop), n. An implement for sharpening razors. See strop. Also called razor-strap.

razure† (rā′zhūr), n. [= F. rasure, < L. rasura, < radere, pp. rasus, scrape: see rase[1], raze[1].] See rasure.

razzia (rat′si-ą), n. [< F. razzia = Pg. gazia, gaziva, a raid, < Algerian Ar. ghazia (Turk. ghazya) (pron. nearly razia in Algiers, the initial letter gh being represented by the F. r grasséyé), a military expedition against infidels, a crusade, a military incursion.] Properly, a military raid intended for the subjection or punishment of hostile or rebellious people by the carrying off of cattle, destruction of crops, etc.; by extension, any plundering or destructive incursion in force. Razzias were formerly common in Arabian countries. They were practised by the Turkish authorities in Algeria and other provinces against tribes or districts which refused to pay taxes; and the word was adopted, and the practice continued for a time, by the French in Algeria after its conquest.

> It was probable he should hand the troops over to John Jones for the razzia against the Moulvie.
> W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 27.

Rb. The chemical symbol of rubidium.

R. C. An abbreviation of Roman Catholic.

R. D. An abbreviation (a) of Royal Dragoons; (b) of Rural Dean.

R. E. An abbreviation (a) of Royal Engineers; (b) of Royal Exchange.

re[1] (rā), n. [See gamut.] In solmization, the syllable used for the second tone of the scale. In the scale of C this tone is D—a tone which is therefore sometimes called re in France and Italy.

re[2] (rē), n. [L., abl. of res, thing, case, matter, affair: see res[2].] A word used in legal language in the phrase in re: as, 'in re Bardell vs. Pickwick,' in the case of Bardell against Pickwick: often elliptically re: as, re Bardell vs. Pickwick; re Brown.

re-. [ME. re- = OF. re-, F. re-, ré- = Sp. Pg. re- = It. re-, ri-, < L. re-, before a vowel or h generally red-, but later also re- (the form red- also occurring in red-dere, render, and, assimilated, in rel-ligio, religion, rel-liquiæ, relics, rec-cidere, fall back, and with a connecting vowel in redivivus, living again), an inseparable prefix, back, again, against: see def. The OF. and It. form re- often appears as ra- by confusion with the true ra- (< L. re- + ad-), and the following consonant is often doubled, as in OF. reppeller, < L. repellere, repel; It. rappresentare, < L. repræsentare, represent; etc. Words with the prefix ra- in OF. usually appear with re- in E., except when the accent has receded, as in rally[1].] An inseparable prefix of Latin origin (before a vowel usually in the form red-), meaning 'back,' 'again.' It occurs in a great number of verbs and derived adjectives and nouns taken from the Latin, and is also common as an English formative. It denotes (a) a turning back ('back'), as in recede, recur, remit, repel, etc.; (b) opposition ('against'), as in reluctant, repugnant, etc.; (c) restoration to a former state ('back,' 'again,' English un-[2]), as in restitution, relegate, redintegrate or reintegrate, and with some words of non-Latin origin, as in recall, remind, renew, etc.; (d) transition to an opposite state, as in reprobate, retract, reveal, etc.; (e) repetition of an action ('again'), as in revise, resume, etc., becoming in this use an extremely common English formative, applicable to any English verb whatever, whether of Latin origin, as in react, reënter, recreate, readdress, reappear, reproduce, reunite, etc., or of Anglo-Saxon or other origin, as in rebind, rebuild, redye, refill, refit, reheat, relight, reline, reload, reset, rewrite, etc. In many words taken from the Latin, either directly or through the Old French, the force of re- (red-) has been lost, or is not distinctly felt, in English, as in receive, reception, recommend, recover[2], reduce, redeem, recuperate, recreate[1], refer, rejoice, relate, religion, remain, renown, repair[1], repair[2], report, request, require, and other words containing a radical element not used in the particular sense concerned, or not used at all, in English. Some of these words, as recover[2], recreate[1], are distinguished from English formations with the clear prefix re-, again, often written distinctively with a hyphen, as in re-cover, re-create, etc. In many instances the prefix, by shifting of accent and change of sound, or loss of adjacent elements, loses the character of a prefix, as in rebel, a., relic, relict, remnant, rest[2], restive, etc., and in words from Old French in which the prefix re- combines with the prefix a- in the form ra-, not recognized as an English prefix, as in rally[1], rabate, etc. In some other words also re- is reduced to r-, as in ransom (doublet of redemption), rampart, rencounter, etc. The prefix re- is found in many words formed in Old French from non-Latin elements, as in regret, regard, reward, etc. As an English formative re- may be prefixed to a primitive verb, adjective, or noun, or to derivatives, indifferently, and such secondary forms as reëstablishment, reaction, etc., may be analyzed either as re- + establishment, re- + action, etc., or as reëstablish + -ment, react + -ion, etc. Prefixed to a word beginning with e, re- is separated by a hyphen, as re-establish, re-estate, re-edify, etc.; or else the second e has a dieresis over it: as, reëstablish, reëmbark, etc. The hyphen is also sometimes used to bring out emphatically the sense of repetition or iteration: as, sung and re-sung. The dieresis is not used over other vowels than e when re- is prefixed: thus, reinforce, reunite, reabolish.

reabsorb (rē-ąb-sôrb′), v. t. [= F. réabsorber; as re- + absorb.] To draw or take in anew by absorption, imbibition, or swallowing, as something previously ejected, emitted, or put forth.

> During the embryo stage of the higher vertebrata temporary organs appear, serve their purpose awhile, and are subsequently reabsorbed.
> H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 458.

reabsorption (rē-ąb-sôrp′shọn), n. [= F. réabsorption; as re- + absorption.] The act of reabsorbing, or the state of being reabsorbed.

reaccommodate† (rē-ą-kom′ọ̄-dāt), v. t. [< re- + accommodate.] To readjust; resettle; bring into renewed order.

> King Edward, . . . discovering the Disturbance made by the Change of Place, instantly sends to charge that Part, without giving them Time to re-accommodate themselves.
> Baker, Chronicles, p. 121.

reaccuse (rē-ą-kūz′), v. t. [< re- + accuse.] To accuse again or afresh; make a renewed accusation against.

> Her'ford, . . . who re-accus'd
> Norfolk for words of treason he had us'd.
> Daniel, Civil Wars, i. 60.

reach[1] (rēch), v.; pret. and pp. reached (formerly raught), ppr. reaching. [Also dial., with shortened vowel, retch, and unassibilated reek; < ME. rechen (pret. raughte, raghte, raght, rehte, reahte, pp. raught, raugt), < AS. rǣcan, rǣcean (pret. rāhte), reach, get into one's power, = OFries. reka, retsia, resza = MD. reijcken, D. reiken = MLG. reken, LG. reiken = OHG. reihhen, reichen, MHG. G. reichen, reach, extend, stretch out. The word has been more or less associated with the group to which belong rack[1], rake[1], rax, retch[1], etc., Goth. rakjan, etc., stretch, and L. reg-ere, por-rigere, Gr. ὀρέγειν, stretch, but an orig. connection is on phonetic grounds improbable.] I. trans. 1. Unto a reachlesse pitch of praises hight.
Bp. Hall, A Defiance to Envy.

reach-me-down (rēch′mē-doun′), a. [< reach[1], v., + me, indirect object, + down[1], adv. Cf. pick-me-up.] Ready-made. [Colloq., Eng.]

You know in the Palais Royal they hang out the most splendid reach-me-down dressing-gowns, waistcoats, and so forth. Thackeray, Philip, xxiv.

reacquite† (rē-a-kwīt′), v. t. [< re- + acquite.] To pay back; give a return to or for; requite.

You shall assuredly find the gentleman very honest and thankful, and me ready to re-acquite your courtesy and favour to him so shewn, in that I possibly may.
G. Harvey, Four Letters, i.

react (rē-akt′), v. [< re- + act, v. Cf. F. réagir, react.] I. trans. To act or perform anew; re-enact: as, to react a play.

II. intrans. 1. To exert, as a thing acted upon, an opposite action upon the agent.

If fire doth heate water, the water reacteth againe . . . upon the fire and cooleth it.
Sir K. Digby, Treatise of Bodies (1644), xvi.

Great minds do indeed re-act on the society which has made them what they are; but they only pay with interest what they have received. Macaulay, Dryden.

Every opinion reacts on him who utters it. It is a thread-ball thrown at a mark, but the other end remains in the thrower's bag. Emerson, Compensation.

2. To act, after being acted upon, in a manner directly opposed to the first action, and in increased measure. Thus, when the body has been chilled by a bath, it is said to react in becoming warmer than before; and, in like manner, when misfortune stimulates the mind to greater efforts, the mind is said to react.
3. To act mutually or reciprocally upon each ★other, as two or more chemical agents.

reaction (rē-ak′shon), n. [= F. réaction = Sp. reacción = Pg. reacção = It. reazione; as re- + action.] 1. Any action in resistance or response to the influence of another action or power; reflexive action or operation; an opposed impulse or impression.

Of reaction in locall motion, that each agent must suffer in acting and act in suffering.
Sir K. Digby, Treatise of Bodies (1644), xvi.

Sense being nothing else, as some conceit, but motion, or rather re-action of a body pressed upon by another body. Dr. H. More, Immortal. of Soul (1662), i. 12.

Attack is the re-action; I never think I have hit hard, unless it re-bounds. Johnson, in Boswell, an. 1775.

Every trespass produces a reaction, partly general and partly special—a reaction which is extreme in proportion as the trespass is great. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 484.

2. In dynamics, a force called into being along with another force, being equal and opposite to it. All forces exist in pairs; and it is a fundamental law (Newton's third law of motion) in mechanics that "action and reaction are always equal and contrary," or that the mutual actions of two bodies are always equal and exerted in opposite directions. This law was announced, in the form that the quantity of motion is preserved in all percussion, simultaneously in 1669 by Christian Huygens, John Wallis, and Sir Christopher Wren, but was experimentally proved by Wallis only.
3. Action contrary to a previous influence, generally greater than the first effect; in politics, a tendency to revert from a more to a less advanced policy, or the contrary.

The violent reaction which had laid the Whig party prostrate was followed by a still more violent reaction in the opposite direction. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., ii.

4. In chem., the mutual or reciprocal action of chemical agents upon each other.—Achilles tendon reaction, the contraction of the calf-muscles evoked by tapping the Achilles tendon.—Amphigenous, amphoteric, etc., reaction. See the adjectives.—Color-reaction, in chem., a reaction which causes a characteristic development or change of color: used in testing.—Diazo-reaction. Same as Ehrlich's reaction.—Ehrlich's reaction, a reaction in the urine of typhoid and other patients in which it strikes a deep dark red on being treated with a mixture containing sodium nitrite, sulphanilic acid, and hydrochloric acid, and alkalinized with ammonia. Also called Ehrlich's test, and diazo-reaction.—Law of action and reaction. See action.—Paradoxical reaction. See paradoxical.—Reaction of degeneration, a modification of the normal reaction of nerve and muscle to electric stimuli, observable in cases where the lesion lies in the motor nerve or its immediate central or peripheral terminations. The complete form presents (a) total loss of irritability of the nerve below the lesion; (b) on direct stimulation of the muscle, (1) loss of irritability for very brief currents, such as induction-shocks; (2) retention and even increase of irritability for making and breaking of currents of longer duration (this galvanic irritability also becomes lost in the terminal stages of the severest forms); (3) increase of irritability for making currents at the anode as compared with the cathode, so that the anode closing contraction may exceed the cathode closing contraction; (4) a sluggishness of contraction and relaxation.

reactionary (rē-ak′shọn-ā-ri), a. and n. [= F. réactionnaire; as reaction + -ary.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to reaction in general; consisting of or characterized by reflex or reciprocal action; reactive.

The reactionary excitement that gave her a proud self-mastery had not subsided.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vi. 10.

Specifically—2. Of or pertaining to political reaction; favoring reaction: as, reactionary principles or movements.

The poverty and suffering of millions of the working classes came in aid of the reactionary party and the more egotistical line of policy.
W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 1st ser., p. 33.

II. n.; pl. reactionaries (-riz). A promoter of reaction; specifically, one who attempts to check, undo, or reverse political action.

The reactionaries and conservatives of Sweden—and there are many of them in this old country—are afraid that free Norway will lead Sweden into the path of reforms.
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 804.

reactionist (rē-ak′shọn-ist), n. [< reaction + -ist.] A favorer of reaction; an advocate of old methods or principles; a reactionary.

Those who are not afraid of the nickname of reactionists will be slow to condemn her [Austria] for the maintenance of a principle on which she has grown into power.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 239.

reaction-period (rē-ak′shọn-pē″ri-ọd), n. Same as reaction-time.

reaction-time (rē-ak′shọn-tīm), n. The time between the application of a stimulus and some motor reaction, as when a finger is lifted in response to a flash of light. The reduced reaction-time is the part of this which is consumed by cerebral processes, as distinct from what is consumed in transmission and in the period of muscular and sensory latency.

reaction-wheel (rē-ak′shọn-hwēl), n. See turbine. ★ reactive (rē-ak′tiv), a. [= F. réactif; as react + -ive.] Pertaining to or causing reaction; acting reflexively or reciprocally; resulting from reflex action.

Ye fish, assume a voice, with praises fill
The hollow rock and loud reactive hill.
Sir R. Blackmore, Creation, vii.

Knowledge of Sanscrit . . will be kept alive by the reactive influence of Germany and England.
Maine, Village Communities, p. 25.

This equilibration between new outer forces and reactive inner forces, which is thus directly produced in individuals. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 296.

reactively (rē-ak′tiv-li), adv. By reaction.

reactiveness (rē-ak′tiv-nes), n. The quality of being reactive.

reactivity (rē-ak-tiv′i-ti), n. [< reactive + -ity.] The state of being reactive; the process or course of reaction, as from a diseased condition.

The occurrence of colour, therefore, is more frequently than not concomitant with a high degree of reactivity.
Nature, XXXVII. 503.

read[1] (rēd), v.; pret. and pp. read (red), ppr. reading. [Early mod. E. also reed, reede, rede; <

Some compare Skt. √ rādh, be successful, Russ. radŭ, glad, happy, ready, Lith. rodas, willing, etc. Hence read[1], n., riddle[1], aread, etc. The verb read in the already obsolete sense 'counsel, advise,' was much affected by Spenser, and in the early modern and ME. spelling rede which he used has likewise been much affected by his archaizing imitators; but there is no historical ground for a difference in spelling. The pret. read (red) should be written red, as it was formerly; it is exactly parallel with led, pret. of lead[1], and with let, pret. of let[1] (inf. formerly lete, with long vowel).] I. trans. 1†. To counsel; advise; recommend.

And she thus brenneth bothe in love and drede,
So that she nyste what was best to rede.
Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 679.

"Leste the kyng and his counseil gor comunes apeire,
And beo stiward in oure stude til ȝe be stouwet betere."
Piers Plowman (A), v. 38.

We may read constancy and fortitude
To other souls. B. Jonson, Poetaster, i. 1.

If there 's a hole in a' your coats,
I rede you tent it.
Burns, Captain Grose's Peregrinations.

My Ladye reads you swith return.
Scott, L. of L. M., iv. 22.

2. To teach; instil, as a lesson.

Are these the arts,
Robin, you read your rude ones of the wood,
To countenance your quarrels and mistakings?
B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, ii. 2.

3. To explain the meaning of; explain; interpret; make out; solve: as, to read a riddle; to read a dream.

Joseph, . . . he that redde so
The kynges metynge, Pharao.
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 281.

Did you draw bonds to forfeit, sign to break?
Or must we read you quite from what you speak?
Donne, Expostulation (ed. 1819).

"I'll read your dream, sister," he says,
"I'll read it into sorrow."
The Braes o' Yarrow (Child's Ballads, III. 71).

I can read my uncle's riddle. Scott, Waverley, lxii.

From her shall read the perfect ways of honour.
Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 5. 38.

Let vs looke backe to Adam, who in this wicked fruit of his bodie might reade continuall lectures of repentance for the sinne of his soule. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 34.

All the gazers on the skies
Read not in fair heaven's story
Expresser truth, or truer glory,
Than they might in her bright eyes.
B. Jonson, Epigrams, xl.

If once the reality of the phenomena were established, we should all be able to read each other's secrets.
Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, II. 10.

8. (a) To observe and apprehend the meaning of (something written, printed, inscribed, or stamped in letters or other significant characters); go over with the eyes (or, in the case of the blind, with the fingers) and take in the meaning of (significant characters forming or representing words or sentences); peruse: as, to read a book, newspaper, poem, inscription, or piece of music.

He . . . radde it over, and gan the letre fold.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1085.

A man of Ethiopia . . . sitting in his chariot read Esaias the prophet. Acts viii. 27, 28.

2. One who interprets; one who acquires knowledge from observation or impression; an interpreter: as, a reader of weather-signs or of probabilities. See mind-reader.—3. One who reads; a person who peruses, studies, or utters aloud that which is written or printed.

And the reader droned from the pulpit,
Like the murmur of many bees,
The legend of good Saint Guthlac.
Longfellow, King Witlaf's Drinking-Horn.

Readers are multiplying daily; but they want guidance, help, plan. Nineteenth Century, XXIV. 499.

Specifically—(a) One who reads for examination or criticism; an examiner of that which is offered or proposed for publication: as, an editorial or a publisher's reader. (b) One who is employed to read for correction for the press; a proof-reader. (c) One who recites before an audience anything written: as, an elocutionary reader. Particularly—(d) One whose office it is to read before an audience; an officer appointed to read for a particular purpose; a lector; a lecturer. (1) In the early church, the Greek Church, the Roman Catholic Church, and some other churches, a member of one of the minor clerical orders, appointed to read Scripture lections in the church. The order of reader existed as early as the second century. At an early date it was not unusual to admit young boys, even of five or six, to the office of reader, but by the sixth century the age of eighteen was required by law. In the Roman Catholic Church this order is little more than one of the steps to the priesthood. The reader (lector) ranks above a doorkeeper and below an exorcist, and the form of ordination is the delivery to him of the book from which he is to read. In the Greek Church the reader (anagnost) ranks below a subdeacon, and it is his office, as it was in the early church, to read the Epistle, the deacon reading the Gospel. In the Church of England the order fell into abeyance after the Reformation, but lay readers were frequently licensed, especially in churches or chapels without a clergyman. They could not minister the sacraments and other rites of the church, except the burial of the dead and the churching of women, nor pronounce the absolution and benediction. Of late years, however, bishops have regularly admitted candidates to the office of reader by delivery of a copy of the New Testament. In the American Episcopal Church lay readers conduct services in vacant churches or under a rector by his request with license from the bishop for a definite period (a year or less). They cannot give absolution or benediction, administer sacraments, nor use the occasional offices of the church except those for the burial of the dead and visitation of the sick and prisoners, nor deliver sermons of their own composition. (2) One who reads the law in a Jewish synagogue. (3) In the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, the English Inns of Court, etc., a lecturer, or, where there are two grades of lecturers, a lecturer of the higher grade, the others being called sublectors or lecturers.

4. A reading-book for schools; a book containing exercises in reading.—Gentle reader, lay reader, etc. See the adjectives.

readership (rē′dėr-ship), n. [< reader + -ship.] The office of reader. See reader, 3 (d) (3).

Acts xvii. 11.

Digby made his peace with Cromwell, and professes his readiness to spend his blood for him.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 274.

=Syn. 2. Readiness, Facility, Expertness, Knack, promptitude, aptness, preparation, preparedness, inclination. The first four words agree in meaning that the person can do a thing with ease and quickness. Readiness emphasizes promptitude: as, readiness in repartee. Facility by derivation emphasizes ease, whether partly natural or wholly acquired. (See ease, n.) Expertness is facility acquired: as, expertness with the pen, at figures, in working a sewing-machine; it is primarily physical, and especially manual, but also mental. Knack is a familiar word, applying to facility or expertness viewed as a happy and rather surprising possession of skill or faculty.

reading (rē′ding), n. [< ME. redynge, ræding, reading, < AS. rēding, reading, a reading, a passage or lesson, also rule, government; verbal n. of rēdan, counsel, rule, read: see read[1].] 1. The act of interpreting; interpretation; exposition, as of a riddle or dream; interpretation of signs, marks, or the like; a rendering or discovery of what is signified by the state or marking of an instrument, by arbitrary signs of any kind, or by the existing condition or action of anything: as, the readings of a steam-indicator; a correct reading of th sky (as to weather), or of a person's countenance or proceedings.

For instance, if the freezing-point is lowered, we must subtract the amount of fall from each reading.
J. Trowbridge, New Physics, p. 187.

Take the readings of the two pegs [in adjusting a field level], which will give their true difference of level.
Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 8905.

2. The particular interpretation given to a composition of any kind, an event or a series of events, etc.; also, a rendering in speech, act, or performance; delineation; representation.

You charm me, Mortimer, with your reading of my weaknesses. By-the-by, that very word Reading, in its critical use, always charms me. An actress's reading of a chamber-maid, a dancer's reading of a hornpipe, a singer's reading of a song, a marine-painter's reading of the sea, the kettle-drum's reading of an instrumental passage, are phrases ever youthful and delightful.
Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, iii. 10.

For Englishmen in their own tongue to have from such a man [Von Ranke] a reading of the most critical period of English history would be a boon of incalculable value.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 58.

His reading of Bach's Italian Concerto was a scramble, so far as the first and last movements were concerned.
The Academy, June 29, 1889, p. 456.

3. The act of perusing that which is written or printed; perusal.

You write with ease to show your breeding,
But easy writing 's curst hard reading.
Sheridan, Clio's Protest.

4. The utterance or recital of recorded words, either from the record (as a printed page) or from memory; specifically, a public lection or lecture: as, to give readings from the poets, or upon law or philosophy. See read[1], v. i., 6.

The Jews had their weekly readings of the law.
Hooker.

The readings [in the Inns of Court] were from the very first deemed of vital importance, and were delivered in the halls with much ceremony. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 88.

5. That which is read or to be read; any written or printed medium of thought or intelligence; recorded matter or material.

It is in newspapers that we must look for the main reading of this generation. De Quincey, Style, i.

Remembering his early love of poetry and fiction, she unlocked a bookcase, and took down several books that had been excellent reading in their day.
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, ix.

6. The indication of a graduated instrument: as, the reading of a barometer.—7. Textual structure or construction; a form, expression, or collocation in a writing, or in a particular copy or impression of it; a version: as, the various readings of a passage in Shakspere; the reading seems to be corrupt.

When you meet with several Readings of the Text, take heed you admit nothing against the Tenets of your Church.
Selden, Table-Talk, p. 22.

Disjunctor reading. See disjunctor.—Penny reading, an amateur entertainment consisting of readings, recitations, music, etc., admission to which is only one penny: common in the British Islands, where such entertainments seem to have been introduced about 1860.—Reading ægrotat. See ægrotat.—Reading notice. See notice.

reading (rē′ding), p. a. Inclined to read; having a taste for reading; of a studious disposition: as, a reading community.—Reading man. See man.

William himself was not a reading man.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

reading-book (rē′ding-bůk), n. [< ME. reding-bok*, < AS. rēding-bōc, reading-book, lectionary, < rēding, reading, + bōc, book.] 1. A lectionary.—2. A book containing selections to be used as exercises in reading.

reading-boy (rē′ding-boi), n. In printing, a boy employed to read copy to a proof-reader; a reader's assistant: in the United States called copy-holder.

reading-desk (rē′ding-desk), n. A desk adapted for use in reading; specifically, a high desk for holding a book or manuscript to be read by a person while standing; in a church, same as lectern, 1.

He feared he should acquit himself badly in St. Ewold's reading-desk. Trollope, Barchester Towers, xxiii.

reading-glass (rē′ding-glȧs), n. A magnifying lens set in a frame with a handle, for use in reading fine print, or for persons with defective vision.

reading-lamp (rē′ding-lamp), n. A lamp especially adapted for use in reading; specifically, a form of lamp for use in public reading or speaking, arranged so that its light is concentrated upon the reading-desk.

reading-pew (rē′ding-pū), n. In English churches, a pew from which to read part of the service; especially, after the Reformation, an inclosure in the body of a church, with a door, seat, and desk or desks, used instead of the older and later form of reading-desk or stalls.

reading-room (rē′ding-röm), n. 1. An apartment appropriated to reading; a room furnished with newspapers, periodicals, etc., to which persons resort for reading.—2. A room or closet set apart for the use of professional proof-readers.

reading-stand (rē′ding-stand), n. A stand to support a book. (a) Same as reading-table. (b) Same as reading-desk.

reading-table (rē′ding-tā″bl), n. A table providing support for a heavy book or books, when in use, and frequently space for other books needed for consultation, and the like. There are many patterns, some having a revolving top.

readjourn (rē-a-jėrn′), v. t. and i. [< F. réajourner, readjourn; as re- + adjourn. Cf. rejourn.] To adjourn again.

Parliament assembling again . . . was then re-adjourned by the king's special command till Tuesday next.
Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiæ, p. 443.

readjournment (rē-a-jėrn′ment), n. [< F. réajournement, readjournment; as readjourn + -ment.] A succeeding adjournment; adjournment anew.

readjust (rē-a-just′), v. t. [< re- + adjust.] 1. To settle again; put in order again, as what had been discomposed.

The beau sheathed his hanger, and readjusted his hair.
Fielding.

2. To adjust in a new way; make a different adjustment, arrangement, or settlement of.

The problem these gentlemen had to solve was to re-adjust the proportion between their wants and their income. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, ii. 4.

My scheme, your better knowledge broke,
Presently readjusts itself, the small Proportioned largelier, parts and whole named new.
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 221.

readjuster (rē-a-jus′tėr), n. [< readjust + -er[1].] 1. One who readjusts, or takes part in a readjustment of something.—2. [cap.] Specifically, a member of a party in Virginia, formed about 1878, under the leadership of General William Mahone, and originally composed principally of Democrats, for the forcible readjustment of the debt on terms dictated by the State without the consent of the bondholders. The exceptional losses of the State in the civil war made the large debt previously contracted very burdensome; and the amount of its liability was in dispute with the State of West Virginia, which had been set off from Virginia without a decision of this question. The Readjusters elected the State government in 1879, and also United States senators for the terms 1881–7 and 1883–9, in opposition to the Conservative Democrats, or Funders; but the party failed to effect a permanent settlement of the debt, and was merged in the Republican party about 1882.

Further news from Virginia indicates that the Repudiators, or Readjusters, as they call themselves, have elected a majority of the General Assembly.
The Nation, Nov. 13, 1879, p. 317.

readjustment (rē-a-just′ment), n. [< readjust + -ment.] 1. The act of readjusting, or the state of being readjusted.—2. Specifically, in U. S. politics, the political schemes of the Readjusters.

readmission (rē-ad-mish′on), n. [< F. réadmission = Sp. readmisión = Pg. readmissão; as re- + admission.] The act of admitting again; the state of being readmitted; renewed admission.

In an exhausted receiver, animals that seem as they were dead revive upon the readmission of fresh air. Arbuthnot.

readmit (rē-ad-mit′), v. t. [= F. réadmettre = Sp. readmitir = Pg. readmittir = It. riammettere, readmit; as re- + admit.] To admit again.

Whose ear is ever open, and his eye
Gracious to re-admit the suppliant.
Milton, S. A., l. 1173.

readmittance (rē-ad-mit′ans), n. [< re- + admittance.] Permission to enter again; readmission.

Humbly petitioning a readmittance into his college.
T. Warton, Sir T. Pope, p. 84. (Latham.)

readvance (rē-ad-vans′), v. i. [< re- + advance, v.] To advance again or afresh.

Which if they miss, they yet should readvance
To former height.
B. Jonson, Epigrams, xxxv., To Sir H. Goodyere.

readvertency (rē-ad-vėr′ten-si), n. [< re- + advertency.] The act of adverting to or reviewing again. [Rare.]

Memory he does not make to be a recovery of ideas that were lost, but a re-advertency or reapplication of mind to ideas that were actually there, though not attended to.
Norris, Reflections on Locke, p. 9.

ready (red′i), a. and n. [< ME. redy, redi, rædi, rædiȝ, i-redi, ready, prepared, prompt, near, < AS. rǣde (rare and uncertain), usually geræde, ready, swift, prompt, easy, plain (suffix -e becoming -i by confusion with the common adj. suffix ME. -i, -y, > E. -y[1]); = OFries. rede, red = D. ree = MLG. rēde, reide, rēt, reit, LG. rede, reed = OHG. bi-reiti, MHG. bereite, be-reit, G. be-reit, ready, prepared, = Icel. g-reithr (ga-reithr*), ready (whence ult. E. graith, grade[2]), = OSw. reda, Sw. be-red = Dan. rede, be-redt, ready; perhaps = Goth. garaids, set, appointed; cf. raidjan, appoint, ga-raidjan, enjoin, command, ga-raideins, an ordinance, rule, authority. Otherwise akin to Icel. reithi, harness, outfit, gear, implements; or to AS., etc., rīdan (pret. rād), ride, rād, a riding, expedition: see ride, road, raid. Hence, in comp., already, and ult. array, curry[1], ray[3], raiment, etc.] I. a. 1. Completely prepared, as for immediate action or use, or for present requirement; suitably equipped, ordered, or arranged; in proper trim or condition.

Comaund, sir kyng, that a clene nauy
Be redy to rode on the rugh see,
All well for the werre, with wight men ynogh.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 2549.

My oxen and my fatlings are killed, and all things are ready. Mat. xxii. 4.

Be ready, Claudio, for your death to-morrow.
Shak., M. for M., iii. 1. 107.

2†. Dressed.

Up ryseth fresshe Canacee hir-selue, . . .
Noon hyer was he [the sun] whan she redy was.
Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 379.

The French leap over the walls in their shirts. Enter, several ways, . . . Alençon and Reignier, half ready, and half unready. Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 1 (stage direction).

Bid my wife make herself ready handsomely,
And put on her best apron.
Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, ii. 4.

3. Suitably disposed in mind; mentally prepared; willing; inclined; not reluctant.

The spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak.
Mark xiv. 38.

A persecutor who inflicts nothing which he is not ready to endure deserves some respect.
Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

4. Prepared by what has gone before; brought to a fit state or condition; not unlikely; immediately liable: with an infinitive.

The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me. Job xxix. 13.

Our king, being ready to leap out of himself for joy of his found daughter, . . . cries, "O, thy mother!"
Shak., W. T., v. 2. 54.

The miserable prisoner is ready to famish.
Dekker, Seven Deadly Sins, p. 45.

5. Already prepared or provided; available for present use or requirement; immediately at hand or within reach; opportune: as, a ready means of escape; a ready way.

And the olde knyght seide that he sholde do sette ther a cheyer, that euer more sholde be redy for the knyght in to sitte that sholde be so trewe in lovynge whan he were come. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 362.

It sometimes cometh to pass that the readiest way which a wise man hath to conquer is to fly.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, Pref.

Nine-score and seventeen pounds; of which he made five marks, ready money. Shak., M. for M., iv. 3. 7.

He pays in ready guineas very liberally.
Swift, Letter, May 13, 1727.

6. Prompt in action or movement; expert; dexterous; facile.

Ready in gibes, quick-answer'd, saucy, and
As quarrelous as the weasel.
Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 4. 161.

Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, . . . and therefore, if a man . . . confer little, he had need have a present wit. Bacon, Studies.

There's a sudden turn now! You have a ready wit for intrigue, I find. Colman, Jealous Wife, i.

7. Prompt; quick; offhand: as, a ready reply or retort; a ready admission; a ready welcome.

My tongue is the pen of a ready writer. Ps. xlv. 1.

Unless he had done this with great dexterity and ready address, he would frequently have been involved in imminent danger. Bacon, Physical Fables, x., Expl.

8†. Present; at hand; here: used in answering a call.

Duke. What, is Antonio here?
Ant. Ready. Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 2.

[Ready is much used in compounds, with participles and sometimes nouns, or in combinations that are properly compounds: as, ready-made; ready-cooked, etc.]—Making ready, in printing, the process of preparation for taking regular impressions from a form on the press. It includes the adjustment of the form on the press, the proper distribution of the pressure on type and cuts by means of underlays and overlays, and the adaptation of ink to paper.—Ready about. See about.—Ready money. See money.—To make ready. (a) To prepare; set in order.

Whiche the fryers kepte and ther thei made the redy in ornaments and began ther a very solempne procession.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 41.

They sit downe at tables, and then must the Bridegrome make triall of his breast in singing a long prayer: others in the meane time call to make readie the hens.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 214.

(b†) To dress.

While Master Mathew reads, Bobadill makes himself ready. B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, i. 4.

Go, and make thee ready straight
In all thy best attire. B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 3.

A man may make him ready in such clothes
Without a candle.
Middleton (and others), The Widow, iii. 3.

=Syn. Ready, Easy; disposed, apt, expert, handy, skilful, clever, smart; expeditious, unhesitating. So many of the meanings of ready convey the idea of a movement of mind, and especially a consent of the will, that there is a tendency to use other words where disposition is not included. Hence it is better to say this may easily be seen, than this may readily be seen. See quotation from Locke under readily. Easy of approach; easy to be done; ready to hear. All the senses of ready, active or passive, grow out of that of being prepared.

II. n. 1. Ready money; cash: usually with the definite article. [Slang.]

Lord Strutt was not flush in ready, either to go to law, or clear old debts. Arbuthnot, Hist. John Bull. (Latham.)

2. The condition of being ready. [Colloq.]—3. The position of a soldier's weapon following the command "Make ready!" or "Ready!" [Colloq.]

T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, p. 119.

A good ready, a state of being fully ready or prepared; a good condition of readiness. [Colloq.]

ready (red′i), v. t.; pret. and pp. readied, ppr. readying. [< ME. redien, redyen (= D. reeden, prepare, dress, = MLG. rēden, reiden = MHG. reiten, reiden; cf. ME. beredien = G. be-reiten = Sw. be-reda = Dan. be-rede, prepare, get ready, etc.); < ready, a.] 1. To make ready; put into proper condition or order; dispose; arrange; prepare. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Thare-fore what-so-euer thou bee that redies the for to lufe Gode, . . . haue in mynde besely for to halde the name of Ihesu in thi mynde.
Hampole, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 3.

And, having readied all these costly things,
In a poore pedlers trusse he packs his wares.
Heywood, Troia Britannica (1609). (Nares.)

2†. To direct.

For, for the gretnesse of the Erthe and of the See, men may go be a 1000 and a 1000 other weyes, that no man cowde redye him perfitely toward the parties that he cam fro, but zif it were be aventure and happ, or be the grace of God. Mandeville, Travels, p. 185.

ready-made (red′i-mād), a. 1. Previously made and now ready for use; furnished or obtained in a formed state; specifically, in trade, made ready for chance sale, and not made to order for a particular person: as, ready-made clothing; ready-made opinions or excuses.

When he hears
The tale of horror, to some ready-made face
Of hypocritical assent he turns.
Shelley, Queen Mab, iii.

The provision-man had honestly the effect of having got for the day only into the black coat which he had bought ready-made for his first wife's funeral.
Howells, Annie Kilburn, xxii.

2. Pertaining to articles prepared beforehand: as, the ready-made department of a tailor's or shoemaker's business. [Trade use.]

ready-man (red′i-man), n. One of the men sent aloft in a man-of-war to prepare for evolutions with spars or sails.

ready-pole (red′i-pōl), n. A bar fixed across a chimney to support the pot-hook. It is now commonly of iron, but was formerly made of wood. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

ready-reckoner (red′i-rek′nėr), n. A book of tabulated calculations, giving the value of any number of things from the lowest monetary unit upward, as also the interest on any sum of money for any period from a day upward, etc.; a book of tables to facilitate calculations.

I could almost think from the preface (but such deductions are very deceptive) that the earliest of the books which are now called ready reckoners, meaning those which have totals at given prices ready cast up, was the following: London 1693. Wm. Leyborn. Panarithmologia; being a mirror for merchants, a brieviate for bankers, a treasure for tradesmen, a mate for mechanics, and a sure guide for purchasers, sellers, or mortgagers of land, leases, annuities, rents, pensions, etc., in present possession or reversion, and a constant concomitant fitted for all men's occasions. De Morgan.

The Clerk in Eastcheap cannot spend the day in verifying his Ready-Reckoner; he must take it as verified, true and indisputable. Carlyle.

reaf†, n. [Usually in Sc. spelling reif, rief; < ME. ref, ræf, reaf, reve, < AS. réaf, spoil, plunder: see reave.] Spoil; plunder; robbery.

Meaning to live by reif of other mennes goodes, wherein they have no maner of propertie.
Holinshed, Chron. (Nares.)

The man that wons yon foreste intill,
He lives by reif and felonie!
Sang of the Outlaw Murray (Child's Ballads, VI. 32).

reaffirm (rē-a-fėrm′), v. t. [= F. réaffirmer; as re- + affirm.] To affirm again.

I close with re-affirming the truth that I have aimed to impress. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 25.

reaffirmance (rē-a-fėr′mans), n. [< reaffirm + -ance.] Renewed affirmation; reaffirmation.

A reaffirmance after such revocation. Ayliffe, Parergon.

reaffirmation (rē-af-ėr-mā′shon), n. [< reaffirm + -ation.] Renewed affirmation; a repeated affirmation.

The great movement of thought which characterises the nineteenth century is a movement through negation to reaffirmation, through destruction to reconstruction.
E. Caird, Hegel, p. 1.

reafforest (rē-a-for′est), v. t. [< re- + afforest.] To convert anew into a forest; renew the forest-growth of; reforest.

The Legislature was obliged to take steps to reafforest considerable tracts. The American, VII. 229.

reafforestation (rē-a-for-es-tā′shon), n. [< re-afforest + -ation.] A second afforestation; promotion of renewed forest-growth.

Even partial reafforestation in Brescia.
The Century, XXXI. 536.

reagency (rē-ā′jen-si), n. [< re- + agency.] Action of or as of a reagent; reflex agency or activity; counter-agency; reaction.

Still, the mind, when acted on, is only excited to self-agency, to manifest what it is in itself, in the way of re-agency. H. B. Smith, Christian Theology, p. 173.

★reagent (rē-ā′jent), n. [< re- + agent. Cf. re-act.] 1. One who or that which exerts reflex action or influence; an agency that produces reciprocal effects; a cause or source of counter-results.

These tools have some questionable properties. They are reagents. Machinery is aggressive. The weaver becomes a web, the machinist a machine.

Emerson, Works and Days.

2. In chem., a substance used to effect chemical change in another substance for the purpose of identifying its component parts or of ascertaining its percentage composition. Thus, the infusion of galls is a reagent which indicates iron in solution by a dark-purple precipitate. Barium chlorid is a reagent which separates sulphuric acid from a solution in the insoluble form of barium sulphate which can be weighed, and from the weight of which the actual amount of sulphuric acid can readily be deduced.

3. Anything used for the treatment of a substance under investigation to render its nature or condition more evident. Ordinarily the object is to see what changes are thus produced, but the word is used more loosely, as in hardening reagents.—Nessler's reagent, a reagent used to detect and determine minute quantities of ammonia, particularly in water. It consists of a strongly alkaline solution of potassio-mercuric iodide. A few drops added to a few fluid ounces of water will cause a slight reddish-yellow tinge if one part of ammonia is present in twenty million parts of water.

reaggravation (rē-ag-ra-vā′shon), n. [< reaggravate + -ion.] In Rom. Cath. eccles. law, the last monitory, published after three admonitions and before the excommunication.

reagree (rē-a-grē′), v. [< re- + agree.] I. intrans. To agree again; become reconciled.

II.† trans. To cause to agree again; reconcile.

And fain to see that glorious holiday
Of union which this discord reagreed.
Daniel, Civil Wars, vii. 111.

reak†, v. i. An obsolete spelling of reek[1].

reaket, n. [Perhaps an erroneous form for wrack or wreck, or an error for reate, q. v.: see wrack, wreck.] A kind of plant. [The word occurs only in the passage quoted, where it is used as a translation of Latin ulva, seaweed.]

The bore is yll in Laurente soyle,
That feedes on reakes and reedes;
Somtymes frome goodly pleasant vine
A sower tendrell speedes.
Drant, tr. of Horace's Satires, ii. 4.

reaks†. See to play rex, under rex.

reaks-player†, n. One who plays reaks (rex). ★Cotgrave.

real[1] (rē′al), a. and n. [< ME. real, reall, < OF. real, reel, F. réel = Pr. Sp. Pg. real = It. reale, < ML. realis, belonging to the thing itself (in the disputes of the Nominalists and Realists), < L. res, a thing; perhaps allied to Skt. √ rā, give. Hence realize, realization, realism, realist, reality, etc.; also, from L. res, E. rebus, republic, republican, etc.] I. a. 1. Actual; genuine; true; authentic; not imaginary, artificial, counterfeit, or factitious: as, real lace.

I waked, and found
Before mine eyes all real, as the dream
Had lively shadow'd. Milton, P. L., viii. 310.

Homer tells us that the blood of the gods is not real blood, but only something like it.

Addison, Spectator, No. 275.

The hatred of unreality was uppermost with Carlyle; the love of what is real with Emerson.

O. W. Holmes, Emerson, iv.

It is probable that the American inventor of the first anæsthetic has done more for the real happiness of mankind than all the moral philosophers from Socrates to Mill. Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 91.

The Teutonic words are all of them real words, words which we are always wanting.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 163.

2. Of genuine character; not pretended or pretending; unassumed or unassuming.

Phœbe's presence made a home about her. . . . She was real! Hawthorne, Seven Gables, ix.

Real kings hide away their crowns in their wardrobes, and affect a plain and poor exterior.

Emerson, Works and Days.

3. Specifically, in philos., existing in or pertaining to things, and not words or thought merely; being independent of any person's thought about the subject; possessing characters independently of the attribution of them by any individual mind or any number of minds; not resulting from the mind's action: opposed to imaginary or intentional. Real differs from actual, inasmuch as what is only in germ or in posse, in so far as it has a power of developing into a definite actuality, is real, and independent of what we may think about it. Real objects are either external to the mind, when they are independent altogether of our thought, or they are internal, when they depend upon thought, but not upon thought about them.

The term real (realis), though always importing the existent, is used in various significations and oppositions. . . . 1. As denoting existence, in contrast to the nomenclature of existence—the thing as contradistinguished from its name. Thus we have definitions and divisions real, and definitions and divisions nominal or verbal. 2. As expressing the existent as opposed to the non-existent—a something in contrast to a nothing. In this sense the diminutions of existence, to which reality in the following significations is counterposed, are all real. 3. As denoting material or external, in contrast to mental, spiritual, or internal, existence. This meaning is improper. . . . 4. As synonymous with actual; and this (a) as opposed to potential, (b) as opposed to possible existence. 5. As denoting absolute or irrespective, in opposition to phænomenal or relative, existence; in other words, as denoting things in themselves and out of relation to all else, in contrast to things in relation to, and as known by, intelligences, like men, who know only under the conditions of plurality and difference. In this sense, which is rarely employed and may be neglected, the real is only another term for the unconditioned or absolute—τὸ ὄντως ὄν. 6. As indicating existence considered as a subsistence in nature (ens extra animam, ens naturæ), it stands counter to an existence considered as a representation in thought. In this sense, reale, in the language of the older philosophy (Scholastic, Cartesian, Gassendian), as applied to esse or ens, is opposed to intentionale, notionale, conceptibile, imaginarium, rationis, cognitionis, in anima, in intellectu, prout cognitum, ideale, etc.; and corresponds with a parte rei as opposed to a parte intellectus, with subjectivum as opposed to objectivum, with proprium, principale, and fundamentale as opposed to vicarium, with materiale as opposed to formale, and with formale in seipso and entitativum as opposed to representativum, etc. Under this head, in the vacillating language of our more recent philosophy, real approximates to, but is hardly convertible with, objective, in contrast to subjective in the signification there prevalent. 7. In close connection with the sixth meaning, real, in the last place, denotes an identity or difference founded on the conditions of the existence of a thing in itself, in contrast to an identity or difference founded only on the relation or point of view in which the thing may be regarded by the thinking subject. In this sense it is opposed to logical or rational, the terms being here employed in a peculiar meaning. Thus a thing which really (re) or in itself is one and indivisible may logically (ratione) by the mind be considered as diverse or plural.

Sir W. Hamilton, Reid's Works, Note B, § 1, 5, foot-note.

Ideas of substances are real when they agree with the existence of things.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxx. 5.

We substitute a real for a dramatic person, and judge him accordingly. Lamb, Artificial Comedy.

For the first time the ideal social compact was real.

5†. Relating to things, not to persons; not personal.

Many are perfect in men's humours that are not greatly capable of the real part of business. Bacon.

6. In law, pertaining to or having the quality of things fixed or immovable. See real estate, etc., below.—Chattel real. See chattel.—Covenant real. See covenant.—Real abstraction. See abstraction.—Real action, in law. See action, 8.—Real assets. See assets, 1.—Real attributive, an attribute known by ordinary observation, generalization, and abstraction, and signified by a term of first intention: opposed to a notional attribute, which is signified by a term of second intention.—Real burden, in Scots law, a burden in money imposed on the subject of a right, as on an estate, in the deed by which the right is constituted, and thus distinguished from a personal burden, which is imposed merely on the receiver of the right.—Real character. See character.—Real component of a force. See component.—Real composition. (a) The union of objects having existences distinct from one another. (b) In Eng. eccles. law, an agreement made between the owner of lands and the parson or vicar, with consent of the ordinary, that such lands shall be discharged from payment of tithes, in consequence of other land or recompense given to the parson in lieu and satisfaction thereof. Also called composition of tithes.—Real concordance. See concordance, 3.—Real contract. See contract.—Real convenience†, the agreement of a thing with itself.—Real definition, the definition of a thing—that is to say, of a species—by stating the components of its essence, or its place in natural classification. For the nominalists there could be no real definition, in the proper sense; hence, finding the definitions so called useful, they invented new definitions of the phrase. The real definition, for Leibnitz and Wolf, is the definition from which the possibility of the thing defined follows; for Kant, the definition which sets forth the possibility of the thing from its essential marks; for Mill, the definition of a name with an implied assumption of the existence of the thing.—Real degradation. See degradation, 1 (a).—Real distinction. (a) A distinction independent of any person's thought. (b) A distinction between real objects. The Scotists made subtle and elaborate definitions of this phrase.—Real diversity, division, ens, essence. See the nouns.—Real estate, in law: (a) Land, including with it whatever by nature or artificial annexation inheres with it as a part of it or as the means of its enjoyment, as minerals on or in the earth, standing or running water, growing trees, permanent buildings, and fences. In this sense the term refers to those physical objects of ownership which are immovable. (b) The ownership of or property in lands, etc.; any legal or equitable interest in lands, etc., except some minor, temporary, or inchoate rights which by the laws of most jurisdictions are deemed to be personal estate. "At common law, any estate in lands, etc., the date of the termination of which is not determined by or ascertainable from or at the date of the act which creates it, is real estate." (Robinson.) The line between the two classes of property is differently drawn in detail, according as the object of the law is to define what shall be taxed, or what shall go to the heir in case of intestacy as distinguished from what shall go through the administrator to the next of kin, or what shall come within the rules as to recording titles, or other purposes.—Real evidence, exchange, focus, fugue. See the nouns.—Real horse-power. Same as indicated horse-power (which see, under horse-power).—Real identity, the non-difference in reality of the extremes of a relation.—Real immunity (eccles.). See immunity, 3.—Real induction. See induction, 5.—Real laws, laws which directly and indirectly regulate property, and the rights of property, without changing the state of the person.—Real noon. Same as apparent noon (which see, under apparent).—Real partition, the mental separation of an object into parts which might be physically separated.—Real poinding, possibility, power, precision, presence, privilege. See the nouns.—Real property. Same as real estate.—Real quality, quantity, relation, representative, restriction, right. See the nouns.—Real question, a question where the attribute in regard to whose presence or absence inquiry is made is a real one.—Real science or philosophy. (a) A science or philosophy that is caused in the mind by a real thing, as physics, mathematics, metaphysics; a speculative science: opposed to practical science, which is caused in the mind by an idea of a thing to be brought about. (b) A science which has a determinate reality for its object, and is conversant about existences other than forms of thought: in this sense, mathematics is not a real science.—Real services. Same as predial services (which see, under predial).—Real things, in law, things substantial and immovable, and the rights and profits annexed to or issuing out of them.—Real truth, the agreement of a judgment with its object: opposed to formal truth, which consists in the agreement of a reasoning with the principles of logic.—The real stuff, the genuine thing; that which is really what is represented or supposed: used especially of liquors. [Colloq.]

In this exhibition there are, of course, a certain number of persons who make believe that they are handing you round tokay—giving you the real imperial stuff, with the seal of genuine stamped on the cork.

Real warrandice. See warrandice.—Syn. 1 and 2. Real, Actual, Positive, veritable, substantial, essential. Real applies to that which certainly exists, as opposed to that which is imaginary or feigned: as, real cause for alarm; a real occurrence; a real person, and not a ghost or a shadow; real sorrow. Actual applies to that which is brought to be or to pass, as opposed to that which is possible, probable, conceivable, approximate, estimated, or guessed at. Actual has a rather new but natural secondary sense of present. Positive, from the idea of a thing's being placed, fixed, or established, is opposed to uncertain or doubtful.

II. n. 1. That which is real; a real existence or object; a reality.

While it is true that correlatives imply each other, it is not true that all correlatives imply Reals. . . . The only meaning we can attach to Reality is that every Real has a corresponding feeling or group of feelings.

realism (rē′al-izm), n. [= F. réalisme = Sp. Pg. It. realismo = G. realismus, < NL. realismus; as real[1] + -ism.] 1. The doctrine of the realist, in any of the senses of that word. See especially realist, n., 1.

(1) Extreme realism taught that universals were substances or things, existing independently of and separately from particulars. This was the essence of Plato's theory of ideas. . . . (2) Moderate realism also taught that universals were substances, but only as dependent upon and inseparable from individuals, in which each inhered: that is, each universal inhered in each of the particulars ranged under it. This was the theory of Aristotle, who held that the τόδε τι or individual thing was the first essence, while universals were only second essences, real in a less complete sense than first essences. He thus reversed the Platonic doctrine, which attributed the fullest reality to universals only, and a merely participative reality to individuals. . . . (3) Extreme nominalism taught that universals had no substantive or objective existence at all, but were merely empty names or words. [See nominalism.] (4) Moderate nominalism or conceptualism taught that universals have no substantive existence at all, but yet are more than mere names signifying nothing; and that they exist really, though only subjectively, as concepts in the mind, of which names are the vocal symbols. . . . (5) [The medieval schoolmen] Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus, and others fused all these views into one, and taught that universals exist in a threefold manner: universalia ante rem, as thoughts in the mind of God; universalia in re, as the essence [quiddity] of things, according to Aristotle; and universalia post rem, as concepts in the sense of moderate nominalism. This is to-day the orthodox philosophy of the Catholic Church, as opposed to the prevailingly exclusive conceptualism of the Protestant world. . . . In contrast with all the views above presented, another and sixth view will now be stated. . . . (6) Relationism or scientific realism teaches that universals, or genera and species, are, first, objective relations of existence among objectively existing things; secondly, subjective concepts of these relations, determined in the mind by the relations themselves; and thirdly, names representative both of the relations and of the concepts, and applicable alike to both. This is the view logically implied in all scientific classifications of natural objects, regarded as objects of real scientific knowledge.
F. E. Abbot, Scientific Theism, Int.

2. In literature and art, the representation of what is real in fact; the effort to exhibit the literal reality and unvarnished truth of things; treatment of characters, objects, scenes, events, circumstances, etc., according to actual truth or appearance, or to intrinsic probability, without selection or preference over the ugly of what is beautiful or admirable: opposed to idealism and romanticism. Compare naturalism.

I wish the reader particularly to observe, throughout all these works of Tintoret, the distinction of the imaginative verity from falsehood on the one hand, and from realism on the other. Ruskin, Modern Painters, III. ii. 3.

A far fuller measure of the ease and grace and life of the realism which Giotto had taught.
D. G. Mitchell, Bound Together, ii.

By realism I mean simply the observation of things as they are, the familiarity with their aspect, physical and intellectual, and the consequent faculty of reproducing them with approximate fidelity.
Contemporary Rev., L. 241.

Exact realism. See Herbartian.—Hypothetic realism. See hypothetic.—Natural realism, the doctrine that in sensation (if not also in volition) we have a direct consciousness of a real object other than ourselves, so that we are as sure of the existence of the outer world as we are of our own, or even of the presence of ideas.

In the act of sensible perception, I am conscious of two things;—of myself as the perceiving subject, and of an external reality . . . as the object perceived. . . . I am conscious of knowing each of them, not mediately, in something else, as represented, but immediately in itself, as existing. . . . Each is apprehended equally, and at once, in the same indivisible energy . . .; and . . . each is apprehended out of, and in direct contrast to, the other. . . . The contents of the fact of perception, as given in consciousness, being thus established, what are the consequences to philosophy, according as the truth of its testimony is, or is not, admitted? On the former alternative, the veracity of consciousness, in the fact of perception, being unconditionally acknowledged, we have established at once, without hypothesis or demonstration, the reality of mind and the reality of matter; while no concession is yielded to the sceptic, through which he may subvert philosophy in manifesting its self-contradiction. The one legitimate doctrine, thus possible, may be called natural realism or natural dualism. . . . If the testimony of consciousness to our knowledge of an external world existing be rejected with the idealist, but with the realist the existence of that world be affirmed, we have a scheme which—as it is by many various hypotheses endeavours on the one hand not to give up the reality of an unknown material universe, and on the other to explain the ideal illusion of its cognition—may be called the doctrine of cosmothetic idealism, hypothetical realism, or hypothetical dualism. This last [system] . . . is the one which . . . has found favour with the immense majority of philosophers.
Sir W. Hamilton, Reid's Works, Note A, § 1, 10.

realist (rē′al-ist), n. and a. [= F. réaliste = Sp. Pg. It. realista = G. realist, < NL. realista; as real[1] + -ist.] I. n. 1. A logician who holds that the essences of natural classes have some mode of being in the real things: in this sense distinguished as a scholastic realist: opposed to nominalist. As soon as intellectual development had reached the point at which men were capable of conceiving of an essence, they naturally found themselves realists. But reflection about words inclined them to be nominalists. Thus, a controversy sprang up between these sects in the eleventh century (first in the Irish monasteries, and then spread through the more civilized countries of northern Europe), and was practically settled in favor of the realists toward the end of the twelfth century. During the fourteenth century a reaction from the subtleties of Scotus produced a revival of nominalistic views, which were brought into a thoroughgoing doctrine by Occam, his followers being distinguished as terminists from other schools of nominalists. At the time when scholasticism came to a rather violent end, owing to the revival of learning, the terminists were in the ascendant, though some of the universities were Scotist. The Cartesians did not profess to be realists; and Leibnitz was a decided nominalist; while the whole weight of the English school (Occam, Hobbes, Locke, Berkeley, Hume, Hartley, Reid, Brown, the Mills, and others) went in the same direction. At the present day philosophy seems to be, and science certainly is, prevailingly realistic. See quotation under realism, 1.

2. A philosopher who believes in the real existence of the external world as independent of all thought about it, or, at least, of the thought of any individual or any number of individuals.—3. In literature and art, a believer in or a practiser of realism; one who represents persons or things as he conceives them to be in real life or in nature; an opponent of idealism or romanticism.

How hard and meagre they seem, the professed and finished realists of our own day, ungraced by that spiritual candor which makes half the richness of Ghirlandaio!
H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 298.

4. One who advocates technical as opposed to classical education; one who upholds the method of the real-schools. [A German use.]

II. a. Of or pertaining to realism; realistic; naturalistic.

realistic (rē-a-lis′tik), a. [< realist + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the realists in philosophy; characteristic of speculative realism.

The realistic tendency—the disposition to mistake words for things—is a vice inherent in all ordinary thinking.
J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 122.

2. Exhibiting or characterized by realism in description or representation; objectively real or literal; lifelike, usually in a bad or depreciatory sense: as, a realistic novel or painting; a realistic account of a murder.

A bit of realistic painting, in the midst of a piece of decorative painting, would offend us, and yet the realistic bit would add a certain amount of veracity.
P. G. Hamerton, Graphic Arts, v.

Realistic they are in the nobler sense: that is, they are true to nature without being slavish copies of nature.
C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 91.

Realistic dualism. See dualism.

realistically (rē-a-lis′ti-kal-i), adv. In a realistic manner; in a manner that has regard to the actual appearance of objects or circumstances, or the real facts of existence.

reality[1] (rē-al′i-ti), n.; pl. realities (-tiz). [= F. réalité = Sp. realidad = Pg. realidade = It. realità, < ML. realita(t-)s, < realis, real: see real[1]. Cf. realty[1].] 1. The being real; truth as it is in the thing; objective validity; independence of the attributions of individual thought; positively determinate being.

Hee exhorted him to beleeve the reality of the sacrament after the consecration.
Foxe, Martyrs, p. 1159, an. 1543.

Reality shall rule, and all shall be as they shall be forever. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., iii. 24.

For this, in reality, is the port of Acre, where ships lie at anchor. Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 56.

In the English plays alone is to be found the warmth, the mellowness, and the reality of painting.
Macaulay, Dryden.

Nothing can have reality for us until it enters within the circle of Feeling, either directly through perception, or indirectly through Intuition. Conception is the symbolical representation of such real presentation.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 11.

2. That which is real or genuine; something that really is or exists, as opposed to what is imagined or pretended; an essential verity or entity, either in fact or in representation.

Of that skill the more thou know'st,
The more she will acknowledge thee her head,
And to realities yield all her shows.
Milton, P. L., viii. 575.

Only shadows are dispensed below,
And Earth has no reality but woe.
Cowper, Hope, l. 68.

They who live only for wealth, and the things of this world, follow shadows, neglecting the great realities which are eternal on earth and in heaven.
Sumner, Orations, I. 194.

3. In law, same as realty[1]. [Now rare.]—Absolute reality. See absolute.—Empirical reality, the reality of an object of actual or conditionate experience.

What we insist on is the empirical reality of time, that is, its objective validity, with reference to all objects which can ever come before our senses. What we deny is that time has any claim to absolute reality, so that, without taking into account the form of our sensuous condition, it should by itself be a condition or quality inherent in things; for such qualities as belong to things by themselves can never be given to us through the senses.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Müller.

Objective reality, truth; reference to a real object. This is the sense in which this phrase is used by Kant. At an earlier date it would have meant existence in the mind. With later writers it means nearly the same as absolute reality.—Practical reality, in the Kantian philos., that force in a postulate of the practical reason by which it becomes the source of the possibility of realizing the summum bonum.

I have, indeed, no intuition which should determine its objective theoretic reality of the moral law, but not the less it has a real application, which is exhibited in concreto in intentions or maxims: that is, it has a practical reality which can be specified, and this is sufficient to justify it even with a view to noumena.
Kant, Critique of Practical Reason, tr. by T. K. Abbott, [p. 146.

Reality of laws, a legal phrase for all laws concerning property and things.—Subjective reality, real existence in the mind.

Time has subjective reality with regard to internal experience; that is, I really have the representation of time, and of my determinations in it.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Müller, p. 37.

Theoretical reality, in the Kantian philos., validity as a hypothesis.—Transcendental reality. Same as absolute reality. = Syn. 1 and 2. Verity (see real[1]). Reality means that a thing certainly is; truth applies to the correctness of what is said or believed about the thing, the conformity of such report or belief to reality. The reality of a danger; the actuality of the arrival of help; the truth about the matter.

reality[2]†, n. Same as realty[2].

Our reality to the emperor. Fuller.

realizability (rē-a-lī-za-bil′i-ti), n. [< realizable + -ity (see -bility).] Capability of being realized. [Rare.]

realizable (rē′a-lī-za-bl), a. [< F. réalisable; as realize + -able.] Capable of being realized.

realization (rē″al-i-zā′shọn), n. [< OF. realisation, F. réalisation; as realize + -ation.] 1. A bringing or coming into real existence or manifestation, as of something conceived or imagined: as, the realization of a project.

The realization of the rights of humanity in the nation is the fulfillment of righteousness.
E. Mulford, The Nation, vi.

The desire is the direction of a self-conscious subject to the realisation of an idea.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 151.

2. Perception of the reality or real existence of something; a realizing sense or feeling: as, the realization of one's danger.

An intrinsic and awful realization of eternal truths.
Islay Burns, Memoir of W. C. Burns, p. 98.

3. The act of realizing upon something; conversion into money or its equivalent; exchange of property for its money value. [Trade use.]—4. The act of converting money into land or real estate. Imp. Dict.

★ Also spelled realisation.

realize (rē′al-īz), v.; pret. and pp. realized, ppr. realizing. [< OF. realiser, F. réaliser = Sp. Pg. realizar; as real[1] + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To make or cause to become real; bring into existence or fact: as, to realize a project, or a dream of empire.

His [Clive's] dexterity and resolution realised, in the course of a few months, more than all the gorgeous visions which had floated before the imagination of Dupleix.
Macaulay, Lord Clive.

All art is the endeavour to realise in material forms and colours an idea of beauty latent in the human spirit from the beginning. Faiths of the World, p. 5.

Children are, as it were, fresh blocks of marble, in which, if we have any ideal, we have a new chance of realizing it after we have failed in ourselves.
J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 128.

2. To perceive or comprehend the reality of; make real or distinct to one's self; recognize the real nature or the actual existence of: as, to realize the horrors of war; to realize one's danger or one's deficiencies.

Intrenched within these many walls, the people of this gay capital cannot realize war. W. Ware, Zenobia, II. xi.

In order to pity suffering we must realise it.
Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 138.

He [Samuel Adams] wanted the whole world to realize that the rule of a republic is a rule of law and order.
J. Fiske, Critical Period of Amer. Hist., iv.

3. To manifest as real or as a reality; exhibit the actual existence or character of; cause to appear real or distinct.

To put these materials to poetical use is required an imagination capable of painting nature, and realizing fiction. Johnson, Milton.

The child realizes to every man his own earliest remembrance, and so supplies a defect in our education, or enables us to live over the unconscious history with a sympathy so tender as to be almost personal experience.
Emerson, Domestic Life.

Correggio appears to have been satisfied with realising the tumult of heaven rushing to meet earth, and earth straining upwards to ascend to heaven in violent commotion. J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 274.

4. To bring or get into actual possession; make one's own; clear as a profit or gain; obtain a return of: as, to realize a fortune from speculation.

Send me an account of the number of crowns you realize. Shelley, To H. Reveley, Oct. 18, 1819.

Pope was the first Englishman who, by the mere sale of his writings, realised a sum which enabled him to live in comfort and in perfect independence.
Macaulay, Montgomery's Poems.

Man begins with nothing realized (to use the word), and he has to make capital for himself by the exercise of those faculties which are his natural inheritance.
J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, ix.

The question of imposing upon what has been termed realised income a higher poundage than that for what has been termed precarious income has been frequently raised. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 136.

5. To bring into form for actual or ready use; exchange for cash or ready means: as, to realize one's stock or securities. [Trade use.]—6. To fetch as a price or return; bring in exchange or as compensation; make a return of: as, how much did the cargo realize? his labor realizes but little.

A farm he sold realised less than was anticipated.
Whyte Melville, White Rose, II. xxvi.

7. To convert into real estate; make real property of. Imp. Dict.

II. intrans. To obtain ready money or profits by sale of property.

Also spelled realise.

realizedness (rē′al-ī-zed-nes), n. The state of being realized. [Rare.]

But taking pleasure to be the feeling of the realizedness of the will or self, we should doubt if apart from some present function or activity pleasure could exist.
F. H. Bradley, Ethical Studies, p. 119.

rean[2]†, n. and v. An old spelling of rein[1].

reanimate (rē-an′i-māt), v. [< re- + animate. Cf. F. réanimer = Sp. Pg. reanimar = It. rianimare.] I. trans. 1. To revive; resuscitate; restore to life, as a person dead or apparently dead: as, to reanimate a person apparently drowned.

We are our re-animated ancestours, and antedate their resurrection. Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, xv.

We may suppose that the creative power returns and reanimates some among the dead.
Isaac Taylor, Nat. Hist. Enthusiasm, p. 66.

2. To revive when dull or languid; invigorate; infuse new life or courage into: as, to reanimate disheartened troops; to reanimate drowsy senses or languid spirits.

Variety reanimates the attention, which is apt to languish under a continual sameness.
Sir J. Reynolds, Discourses, viii.

II. intrans. To revive; become lively again. [Rare.]

"There spoke Miss Beverley!" cried Delvile, reanimating at this little apology. Miss Burney, Cecilia, ix. 5.

reanimation (rē-an-i-mā′shọn), n. [< reanimate + -ion.] The act or operation of reanimating, or reviving from apparent death; the act or operation of giving fresh spirits, courage, or vigor; the state of being reanimated.

Having opened his father's casque, he was rejoiced to see him give symptoms of reanimation.
Scott, Anne of Geierstein, xxxvi.

reannex (rē-ạ-neks′), v. t. [< re- + annex.] To annex again; annex what has been separated; reunite.

King Charles was not a little inflamed with an ambition to repurchace and re-annex that duchie.
Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 40.

reannexation (rē-an-ek-sā′shọn), n. [< reannex + -ation.] The act of annexing again.

reanoint (rē-ạ-noint′), v. t. [< re- + anoint.] To anoint again or anew.

And Edward, . . .
Proud in his spoils, to London doth repair,
And, reanointed, mounts th' imperial chair.
Drayton, Miseries of Queen Margaret.

reanswer (rē-ạn′sẹr), v. t. [< re- + answer.] 1. To answer again; make a renewed reply to.—2†. To answer or satisfy as a return; correspond to; equal; balance.

Bid him therefore consider of his ransome; which must proportion the losses we have borne, . . . which in weight to re-answer, his pettiness would bow under.
Shak., Hen. V., iii. 6. 136.

reap (rēp), v. [< ME. repen, reopen, ripen (pret. rap, rep, pl. repen, ropen, pp. repen, ropen, later reaped), < AS. rīpan, a variable verb, being in part strong (pret. pl. ripon), also gerīpan (pret. pl. geripon), also with short vowel ripan, Anglian riopan, rioppan, hrioppan, hrippan (pret. ræp*, pl. rǣpon), and in part (and appar. orig.) weak, rȳpan (pret. rȳpte*, not found), reap (cf. rīp, rȳp, a reaping, harvest): appar. a particular use of rīpan, prop. rȳpan (pret. pl. rȳpton, rǣpton), plunder, spoil, = OHG. roufen, MHG. roufen, reufen, röufen, G. raufen, pluck, pull, etc., = Goth. raupjan, pluck. Cf. D. rapen, reap, gather.] I. trans. 1. To cut with a sickle or other implement or machine; cut down and gather: used specifically of cutting grain: as, to reap wheat or rye.

When ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field. Lev. xix. 9.

That which they reapt on the land was put into storehouses built for that purpose.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 876.

And no Man ever reapt his Corn,
Or from the Oven drew his Bread,
Ere Hinds and Bakers yet were born,
That taught them both to sow and knead.
Prior, Alma, i.

2. To cut a crop of grain, or something likened to such a crop, from; clear by or as if by reaping.

His chin new reap'd
Show'd like a stubble-land at harvest-home.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 3. 34.

3. Figuratively, to gather in by effort of any kind; obtain as a return or recompense; garner as the fruit of what has been done by one's self or others.

They have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind. Hos. viii. 7.

Of our labours thou shalt reap the gain.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 7. 20.

He cannot justly expect to reape aught but dishonour and dispraise. Milton, Eikonoklastes, v.

Do thou the deeds I die too young to do,
And reap a second glory in thine age!
M. Arnold, Sohrab and Rustum.

II. intrans. 1. To perform the act or operation of reaping; cut and gather a harvest.

Yf y repe, [I] ouere-reche, other gaf hem red that repen To sese to me with here sykel; that ich sew neuere.
Piers Plowman (C), vii. 270.

Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap. Micah vi. 15.

I would the globe from end to end
Might sow and reap in peace.
Tennyson, Epilogue.

2. Figuratively, to gather the fruit of labor or works; receive a return for what has been done.

For wel I wot that ye han herbeforne
Of makynge [poetry] ropen, and lad awey the corne.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 74.

They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. Ps. cxxvi. 5.

reap† (rēp), n. [Early mod. E. also repe; < ME. reepe, rep, rip, < AS. rīp, rȳp, a reaping, a crop, harvest (also in comp., as rīp-man, harvester, rīp-tīma, harvest), also a sheaf of grain, etc., < rīpan, rȳpan, reap: see reap, v.] A sheaf of grain. [Prov. Eng.]

As mych as oone reepe.
Towneley Mysteries, p. 13. (Halliwell.) reaper (rē′pẹr), n. [< ME. repare, ripere, < AS. rīpere, a reaper, < rīpan, reap: see reap, v.] 1. One who reaps; one who cuts grain with a sickle or other implement or machine; hence, one who gathers in the fruits of his own or others' labor or work.

When brown August o'er the land
Call'd forth the reapers' busy band.
Scott, Rokeby, vi. 35.

In the vast field of criticism on which we are entering, innumerable reapers have already put their sickles.
Macaulay.

Only reapers, reaping early
In among the bearded barley,
Hear a song that echoes cheerly.

Tennyson, Lady of Shalott, i.

There is a reaper whose name is Death,
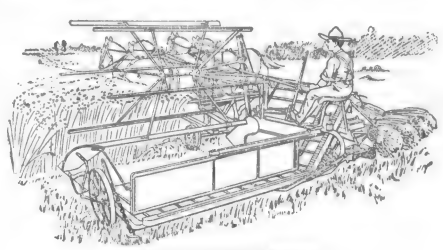
And with his sickle keen
He reaps the bearded grain at a breath,
And the flowers that grow between.
Longfellow, The Reaper and the Flowers.



2. A machine for cutting grain; a reaping-machine.—The reaper, an ancient sophism, to the following effect: If you are to reap, it is not true that perhaps you will reap and perhaps not, but you will certainly reap. On the other hand, if you are not to reap, it is not true that perhaps you will reap and perhaps not, but you will certainly not. Thus you will either necessarily reap, or necessarily not reap, and the statement that there is a "perhaps" is false.

reap-hook (rēp′hůk), n. Same as reaping-hook. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

reaping-hook (rē′ping-hůk), n. A curved blade with a short handle for reaping; a sickle; specifically, a sickle without the notched edge which formerly distinguished that implement.

The reapers in Palestine and Syria still make use of the reaping-hook in cutting down their crops: and "fill their hand" with the corn, and those who bind up the sheaves their "bosom."—Ps. cxxix. 7; Ruth ii. 5. Kitto.

reaping-machine (rē′ping-mạ-shēn″), n. A harvesting-machine for grain-crops; a mechanical reaper drawn over a field of standing grain by horses. The reaping-machine is a modified mowing-machine or mower, both mower and reaper being harvesters; the two machines are identical in their mechanism for cutting down the standing grain, of which mechanism the essential feature is the reciprocating knife moving within the fingers of a finger-bar. The reaper is distinguished from the mower by the addition of a reel for bending the grain down upon the knives, and by a platform, a raking mechanism, a discharging mechanism or dropper (by which the gavels or sheaves are thrown out of the machine), and a binding mechanism; of these devices any or all may be present in one machine. Reaping-machines are often distinguished according to their attachments: thus, a dropper is a reaping-machine that automatically throws out the cut grain at intervals; a self-raker or a self-binder, sometimes called a harvester and binder, is one with a raking or a binding attachment. The discharging mechanism or dropper is a device for causing the platform upon which the grain falls when cut to throw off its load. The raking attachment consists of a series of rakes moving over the platform to gather the grain into gavels and sweep it off upon the ground. The binding attachment consists essentially of an endless-belt elevator for lifting the cut grain, and a pair of curved arms for gathering and compressing it into a bundle and holding it while the binding mechanism proper draws wire or twine around it, twists the wire or loops and knots the twine, cuts the bundle from the wire or twine, and discharges the bound sheaf.

reapman† (rēp′mạn), n. [< ME. repman, < AS. rīpman* (Anglian hrīpeman), a harvestman, < rīp, harvest, + man, man.] A reaper; a harvestman.

Oon daywerk of a goode repman may gete
V strik, a febbler for III may swete.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 158.

reapparel (rē-ạ-par′el), v. t. [< re- + apparel, v. Cf. reparel.] To apparel or clothe again or anew.

Then [at the resurrection] we shall all be invested, reapparelled, in our own bodies.
Donne, Devotions, Expostulation, xiv.

reapparition (rē-ap-ạ-rish′ọn), n. [< re- + apparition.] A renewed apparition; a coming again; reappearance. [Rare.]

There would be presented the phenomena of colonies, reapparitions, and other faunal dislocations in the vertical and horizontal distribution of fossil remains.
Winchell, World-Life, p. 231.

reappear (rē-ạ-pēr′), v. i. [= It. riapparire; as re- + appear. Cf. OF. rapparoitre, F. réapparaître, reappear.] To appear again or anew; return to sight or apprehension; be seen again, in either the same or a different example.

The law of harmonic sounds reappears in the harmonic colors. Emerson, Nature, v.

Energy . . . only vanishes to reappear under some other form. W. L. Carpenter, Energy in Nature, p. 12.

The river that reappears at Ombla is an old friend.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 238.

reappearance (rē-ạ-pēr′ạns), n. [< reappear + -ance.] A new appearance; another coming into view or apprehension: as, the reappearance of Encke's comet.

reapplication (rē-ap-li-kā′shọn), n. [< re- + application.] The act of applying again, or the state of being reapplied.

A readvertency or reapplication of mind to ideas that are actually there.
Norris, Reflections on Locke, p. 9. (Latham.) reapply (rē-ạ-plī′), v. t. and i. [< re- + apply.] To apply again.

reappoint (rē-ạ-point′), v. t. [< re- + appoint.] To appoint again.

reappointment (rē-ạ-point′mẹnt), n. [< reappoint + -ment.] A renewed appointment.

reapportion (rē-ạ-pōr′shọn), v. t. [< re- + apportion.] To apportion again; make a new apportionment.

reapportionment (rē-ạ-pōr′shọn-mẹnt), n. [< reapportion + -ment.] A renewed apportionment; a new proportional distribution or arrangement: as (in the United States), the reapportionment of members of Congress or of Congressional districts under a new census.

reapproach (rē-ạ-prōch′), v. [< re- + approach.] I. intrans. To come near again.

II. trans. To bring near together again.

We were able to produce a lovely purple, which we can destroy or recompose at pleasure, by severing and re-approaching the edges of the two irises.
Boyle, Works, I. 738.

reap-silver† (rēp′sil″vẹr), n. [ME. repsilver; < reap, n., + silver.] Money paid by feudal serfs or tenants to their lord as a commutation for their services in reaping his crops.

rear[1] (rēr), v. [Early mod. E. also reer, rere, also dial. rare; < ME. reren, < AS. rǣran (= Icel. reisa = Goth. raisjan), cause to rise, lift up, establish, rouse, elevate, etc.; causative of rīsan (pret. rās), rise: see rise[1], and cf. raise[1], which is from the Icel. form (reisa) of the same verb. The change of the orig. medial s to r occurs also in were (pl. of was), ear[1], iron, lorn, etc.] I. trans. 1. To raise, lift, or hoist by or as if by main strength; bring to or place in an elevated position; set or hold up; elevate; bear aloft.

Off with the traitor's head,
And rear it in the place your father's stands.

He stirs men up to outrageous rearing of rents.
Latimer, 6th Sermon bef. Edw. VI.

9. To develop or train physically or mentally or both, as young; care for while growing up; foster; nurture; educate: used of human beings, and less frequently of animals and plants. See raise[1].

The pokok men may rere up esily
Yf bestes wilde or theves hem ne greve.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 23.

She [Pharaoh's daughter] takes him vp, and rears him royal-like;
And his quick Spirit, train'd in good Arts, is like
A wel breath'd Body, nimble, sound, and strong.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Lawe.

Delightful task! to rear the tender Thought,
To teach the young Idea how to shoot.
Thomson, Spring, l. 1150.

10. To mock; gibe. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]
=Syn. 9. Bring up, etc. See raise[1].

II. intrans. 1. To rise up; assume an elevated posture, as a horse or other animal in standing on its hind legs alone.

Ofte hit [the ark] roled on-rounde, and rered on ende.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 423.

Anon he rears upright, curvets, and leaps.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 279.

2. To rise up before the plow, as a furrow. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—Rearing vein, in coal-mining, a vein that seems to rear like a horse or mule. See rearer, 3.

rear[2] (rēr), a. [Early mod. E. also reer, rere, also dial. (now in common use in the U. S.) rare; < ME. rere, < AS. hrēr, underdone (said only of eggs): hrēr henne æg, 'a rear hen's egg,' hrērenbrǣden æg, hrērebrǣd æg, 'a rear roasted egg,' gebrǣddan hrēre ægeran, 'roasted rear eggs'; appar. not an independent adj., but the stem of a verb, in comp. hrēr-æg* (= G. rühr-ei, a scrambled egg, buttered egg; cf. eier rühren, beat eggs), < hrēran, move, shake, stir, + æg, egg: see rear[4].] Underdone; nearly raw; rare: formerly said of eggs, now (in the United States, in the form rare) of meats. Compare rear-boiled, rear-roasted. [Obsolete or provincial.]

Rere, or nesche, as eggys. Mollis, sorbilis.
Prompt. Parv., p. 430.

Can a soft, rear, poor poach'd iniquity
So ride upon thy conscience?
Middleton, Game at Chess, iv. 2.

★ rear[3] (rēr), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also reer, rere; < ME. rere, in comp. rereward, rearward and arere, arrear (see arrear[2], adv.), < OF. rere, riere, back, < L. retro, back, backward, < re, back, + compar. suffix (in abl.) -tro. But in ME. and mod. E. rear as a prefix is rather an aphetic form of arear, arrear: see arrear[2], adv.]

I. n. 1. The space behind or at the back; a tract or a position lying backward; the background of a situation or a point of view.

Tom Pipes, knowing his distance, with great modesty took his station in the rear. Smollett, Peregrine Pickle, ii.

Crook . . . conducted his command south in two parallel columns until he gained the rear of the enemy's works.
P. H. Sheridan, Personal Memoirs, II. 37.

2. The back or hinder part; that part of anything which is placed or comes last in order or in position.

His yeomen all, both comly and tall,
Did quickly bring up the rear.
Robin Hood and Maid Marion (Child's Ballads, V. 375).

Like a gallant horse fall'n in first rank,
Lie there for pavement to the abject rear,
O'er-run and trampled on.
Shak., T. and C., iii. 3. 162.

While the cock, with lively din,
Scatters the rear of darkness thin.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 50.

Were they in the front or in the rear of their generation?
Macaulay, Sir J. Mackintosh.

3. In specific military use, the hindmost body of an army or a fleet; the corps, regiment, squadron, or other division which moves or is placed last in order: opposed to van: as, the rear was widely separated from the main body.

The Vanguard he commits to his Brother the Count de Alanson, the Reer to the Earl of Savoy.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 121.

To bring up the rear. See bring. [In comp. rear is practically a prefix. In older words it is always rere; for such words, see entries in rere-.]

II. a. Pertaining to or situated in the rear; hindermost; last: as, the rear rank.—Rear front, the rear rank of a company or body of men when faced about and standing in that position.—Rear supper†. See rere-supper.—Rear vault, in arch., a small vault over the space between the tracery or glass of a window and the inner face of the wall.

rear[3]† (rēr), v. t. [< rear[3], v.] To send to or place in the rear.

rear[4]†, v. t. [< ME. reren, < AS. hrēran, move, shake, stir, = OS. hrōrian, hrōrien, hruorian, shake, = OHG. hruorjan, hrōrjan, ruoran, MHG. rüeren, G. rühren, shake, touch, = Icel. hræra = Sw. röra = Dan. røre, move, stir; perhaps = Goth. hrōzjan* (not recorded), akin to hrisjan, shake. Hence, in comp., rearmouse, reremouse, and uproar. Cf. rear[2].] 1. To move; stir.—2. To carve: applied to the carving of geese. Halliwell.

Rere that goose. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 265.

rearage† (rēr'āj), n. [ME., by apheresis for arerage: see arrearage.] Arrearage.

Such dedes I did wryte, gif he his day breke.
I haue mo maneres [manors] thorw rerages than thorw miseretur et comodat. Piers Plowman (B), v. 246.

ffor he wylle gyfe a rekenyng that rewe salle aftyre, . . .
Or the rereage be requit of rentez that he claymez!
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 1680.

rear-boiled† (rēr'boild), a. [Formerly rere-boiled; < rear[2] + boiled.] Partly boiled.

A rere-boiled egg, Een half gaar gekookt ey.
Sewel, Eng.-Dutch Dict.

reard†, n. [< ME. rerd, rerid, reorde, rorde, rurd, < AS. reord (for reard*), voice, speech, language, = OHG. rarta = Icel. röddr (gen. raddar) = Goth. razda, a voice, sound.] A voice; sound.

Ecko . . . is the rearde thet ine the hege helles [high hills] comth ayen. Ayenbite of Inwit (E. E. T. S.), p. 60.

reardorse†, n. [< ME. reredors: see reredos.] 1. An open fireplace against the rear wall of a room, without a chimney, the smoke rising and escaping through the louver.

In their [the old men's] yoong daies there were not aboue two or three [chimneys], if so manie, in most vplandish townes of the realme (the religious houses, manour places of their lords, alwaies excepted, and peraduenture some great personages), but ech one made his fire against a reredosse in the hall, where he dined and dressed his meat.
Harrison, Descrip. of Eng., ii. 12. (Holinshed.)

Also, you shall inquire of all armorers and other artificers using to work in mettal, which have or use any reardorses, or any other places dangerous or perillous for fire.
Calthrop's Reports (1670). (Nares.)

2. A piece of armor for the back.

Ane hole brest-plate, with a rere-dors
Behynde shet, or elles on the syde.
Clariodes, MS. (Halliwell.)

rear-eggt, n. An underdone egg. See rear[2], a.

rearer (rēr'ėr), n. 1. One who rears or raises; one who brings up.

Pholoë, . . . the rearer of the steed.
Lewis, tr. of Statius's Thebaid, x.

2. A rearing horse, ass, or mule; an animal that has a habit of rearing.—3. In coal-mining, a seam of coal having an inclination of more than thirty degrees.

rear-guard (rēr'gärd), n. [Early mod. E. reregarde, for areregarde*, < OF. ariere-garde*, arriere-garde, F. arrière-garde, rear-guard; as rear[3] + guard, n. Cf. rearward.] Part of an army detached during a march for the protection of the rear, especially in retreating when the attacks of a pursuing enemy are feared.

We can nat se aboute vs, nor haue knoledge of your reregarde nor vowarde.
Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., II. cxiii.

reargue (rē-är'gū), v. t. [< re- + argue.] To argue over again.

reargument (rē-är'gū-ment), n. [< re- + argument.] A renewed argumentation, as of a case in court; a new arguing or pleading upon the same matter.

★ rearhorse (rēr'hôrs), n. A gressorial and raptorial orthopterous insect of the family Mantidæ; a praying-mantis, camel-insect, or devil's coach-horse: so called from the way in which it rears upon its hind legs. The common rearhorse of the United States is Stagmomantis carolina. See Empusa, and cut under mantis.

Rearing-bit.

rearing-bit (rēr'ing-bit), n. A bit intended to prevent a horse from lifting his head when rearing. In the accompanying cut, a, a are rings for cheek-straps, to which also the chain b is attached, in use passing under the horse's lower jaw; c, c are rings for attachment of curb-reins. The side-pieces, d, d act as levers when the reins are pulled, and force open the horse's jaw, the curved part of the bit pressing forward and downward upon the tongue of the animal, thus causing him pain when he attempts to rear.

rearing-box (rēr'ing-boks), n. In fish-culture, a fish-breeder.

rearly (rēr'li), adv. [< rear[5] + -ly[2].] Early. [Prov. Eng.]

Jailer's Brother. I'll bring it to-morrow.
Jailer's Daughter. Do, very rearly, I must be abroad else, To call the maids.
Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, iv. 1.

rearmost (rēr'mōst), a. superl. [< rear[3] + -most.] Furthest in the rear; last of all.

The rest pursue their course before the wind,
These of the rear-most only left behind.
Rowe, tr. of Lucan's Pharsalia, iii.

rearmouse, n. See reremouse.

rearrange (rē-a-rānj'), v. t. [< re- + arrange.] To arrange anew; make a different arrangement of.

rearrangement (rē-a-rānj'ment), n. [< rearrange + -ment.] A new or different arrangement.

rear-roasted† (rēr'rōs″ted), a. Partly roasted. Compare rear[2].

There we complaine of one reare-roasted chick,
Here meat worse cookt nere makes us sick.
Sir J. Harington, Epigrams, iv. 6. (Nares.)

reart (rērt), v. t. [A corruption of reet, a dial. var. of right, v.] To right or mend. Halliwell. [Local, Eng.]

rearward[1]† (rēr'wârd), n. [Early mod. E. rereward; < ME. rerewarde, short for arere-warde, < OF. arere-warde, < arere, back, + ward, garde, ward, guard: see arrear[2] and ward. Cf. doublet rear-guard.] 1. A rear-guard; a body or force guarding the rear.

The standard of the camp of the children of Dan set forward, which was the rereward [rearward, R. V.] of all the camps. Num. x. 25.

The God of Israel will be your rereward [rearward, R. V.].
Isa. lii. 12.

Because . . . it was bootlesse for them [the Turks] to assaile the forefront of our battell, . . . they determined to set vpon our rereward. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 20.

Hence—2. Any company or body of persons bringing up the rear; the rear.

He . . . speaks to the tune of a country lady, that comes ever in the rearward or train of a fashion.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iv. 1.

rearward[2] (rēr'wärd), adv. [< rear[3] + -ward.] At or to the rear; toward the hinder part; backward from anything.

Rearward extended the curtain of mountains, back to the Wolkenburg. Longfellow, Hyperion, i. 1.

rearward[2] (rēr'wärd), a. and n. [< rearward[2], adv.] I. a. Situated at or toward the rear; being or coming last.

II. n. Place or position at the rear; the part that comes last; rear; end; conclusion; wind-up.

'A came ever in the rearward of the fashion.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iii. 2. 339.

rearwardly (rēr'wärd-li), adv. In a rearward direction; toward the rear; rearward. [Objectionable.]

Having a handle . . . extending rearwardly beyond the suction tube. The Engineer, LXV. 374.

reascend (rē-a-send'), v. i. and t. [< re- + ascend.] To ascend, mount, or climb again.

Taught by the heavenly Muse to venture down
The dark descent, and up to reascend.
Milton, P. L., iii. 20.

He mounts aloft and reascends the skies. Addison.

reascension (rē-a-sen'shọn), n. [< re- + ascension.] The act of reascending; a remounting.

reascent (rē-a-sent'), n. [< re- + ascent.] A rise of ground following a descent.

Hence the declivity is sharp and short,
And such the reascent. Cowper, Task, i. 327.

reason[1] (rē'zn), n. [< ME. reson, resun, resoun, raisoun, reisun, < OF. reson, resoun, reison, reasoun, reason, raison, raisoun, raisun, F. raison, F. dial. roison = Pr. razo, raxio = Cat. raho = Sp. razón = Pg. razão = It. ragione, < L. ratio(n-), reckoning, list, register, sum, affair, relation, regard, course, method, etc., also the faculty of reckoning, or of mental action, reason, etc., < reri, pp. ratus, think: see rate[2]. Reason[1] is a doublet of ratio and ration.] 1. An idea acting as a cause to create or confirm a belief, or to induce a voluntary action; a judgment or belief going to determine a given belief or line of conduct. A premise producing a conclusion is said to be the reason of that conclusion; a perceived fact or reflection leading to a certain line of conduct is said to be a reason for that conduct; a cognition giving rise to an emotion or other state of mind is said to be a reason of or for that state of mind.

And be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you.
1 Pet. iii. 15.

Give you a reason on compulsion! If reasons were as plentiful as blackberries, I would give no man a reason upon compulsion. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 4. 264.

2. A fact, known or supposed, from which another fact follows logically, as in consequence of some known law of nature or the general course of things; an explanation.

No sooner sighed but they asked one another the reason; no sooner knew the reason but they sought the remedy.
Shak., As you Like it, v. 2. 39.

Not even the tenderest heart, and next our own,
Knows half the reasons why we smile or sigh.
Keble, Christian Year, 24th Sunday after Trinity.

3. An intellectual faculty, or the generic name for intellectual processes. (a) The intellectual processes collectively. (b) That kind and degree of intelligence which distinguishes man from the brutes.

And at the end of the days I Nebuchadnezzar lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, and I blessed the most High. . . . At the same time my reason returned unto me. Dan. iv. 36.

O judgment! thou art fled to brutish beasts,
And men have lost their reason.
Shak., J. C., iii. 2. 110.

For smiles from reason flow,
To brute denied. Milton, P. L., ix. 239.

(c) The logical faculties or processes, including all that is subservient to distinguishing truth and falsehood, except sense, imagination, and memory on the one hand, and the faculty of intuitively perceiving first principles, and other lofty faculties, on the other.

The knowledge which respecteth the Faculties of the Mind of man is of two kinds: the one respecting his Understanding and Reason, and the other his Will, Appetite, and Affection; whereof the former produceth Position or Decree, the later Action or Execution. . . . The end of Logic is to teach a form of argument to secure reason, and not to entrap it; the end of Morality is to procure the affections to obey reason, and not to invade it; the end of Rhetoric is to fill the imagination to second reason, and not to oppress it. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

But God left free the will; for what obeys Reason is free, and reason he made right,
But bid her well be ware, and still erect;
Lest, by some fair-appearing good surprised,
She dictate false, and misinform the will
To do what God expressly hath forbid.
Milton, P. L., ix. 352.

We may in reason discover these four degrees: the first and highest is the discovering and finding out of proofs; the second, the regular and methodical disposition of them, and laying them in a clear and fit order, to make their connection and force be plainly and easily perceived; the third is the perceiving of their connection; and the fourth is a making a right conclusion.
Locke, Human Understanding, iv. 17, § 3.

(d) The faculty or process of drawing conclusions or inferences, or of reasoning.

When she rates things, and moves from ground to ground,
The name of reason she obtains by this;
But when by reason she the truth hath found,
And standeth fix'd, she understanding is.
Sir J. Davies, Immortal. of Soul, § 25.

The Latins called accounts of money rationes, and accounting ratiocinatio; and that which we in books of accounts call items they call nomina, that is, names; and thence it seems to proceed that they extended the word ratio to the faculty of reckoning in all other things. The Greeks have but one word, λόγος, for both speech and reason; not that they thought there was no speech without reason, but no reasoning without speech. . . . Out of all which we may define, that is to say determine, what that is which is meant by this word reason, when we reckon it amongst the faculties of the mind. For reason, in this sense, is nothing but reckoning.
Hobbes, Leviathan, i. 4.

(e) The faculty by which we attain the knowledge of first principles; a faculty for apprehending the unconditioned.

Some moral and philosophical truths there are so evident in themselves that it would be easier to imagine half mankind run mad, and joined precisely in the same species of folly, than to admit anything as truth which should be advanced against such natural knowledge, fundamental reason, and common sense. Shaftesbury.

Reason is the faculty which supplies the principles of knowledge a priori.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Müller, p. 11.

4. Intelligence considered as having universal validity or a catholic character, so that it is not something that belongs to any person, but is something partaken of, a sort of light in which every mind must perceive.—5. That which recommends itself to enlightened intelligence; some inward intimation for which great respect is felt and which is supposed to be common to the mass of mankind; reasonable measure; moderation; right; what mature and cool reflection, taking into account the highest considerations, pronounces for, as opposed to the prompting of passion.

You shall find me reasonable; if it be so, I shall do that that is reason. Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1. 218.

Reason is the life of the law; nay, the common law itself is nothing else but reason. Sir E. Coke, Institutes.

To subdue
By force who reason for their law refuse,
Right reason for their law, and for their King Messiah, who by right of merit reigns.
Milton, P. L., vi. 41.

Many are of opinion that the most probable way of bringing France to reason would be by the making an attempt upon the Spanish West Indies.
Addison, Present State of the War.

6. A reasonable thing; a rational thing to do; an idea or a statement conformable to common sense.

And telle he moste his tale as was resoun,
By forward and by composicioun,
As ye han herd.
Chaucer, Prol. to Knight's Tale (ed. Morris), l. 847.

It is not reason that we should leave the word of God and serve tables. Acts vi. 2.

Men cannot retire when they would, neither will they when it were reason. Bacon, Great Place.

7. The exercise of reason; reasoning; right reasoning; argumentation; discussion.

Your reasons at dinner have been sharp and sententious.

I follow'd her; she what was honour knew,
And with obsequious majesty approved
My pleaded reason. Milton, P. L., viii. 510.

8. The intelligible essence of a thing or species; the quiddity.

That other opinion, that asserts that the abstract and universal rationes, reasons, of things, as distinct from phantasms, are nothing else but mere names without any signification, is so ridiculously false that it deserves no confutation at all.
Cudworth, Eternal and Immutable Morality, iv. 1.

9. In logic, the premise or premises of an argument, especially the minor premise.

A premiss placed after its conclusion is called the Reason of it, and is introduced by one of those conjunctions which are called causal: viz., "since," "because," &c.
Whately, Logic, i. § 2.

By reason†. (a) For the reason that; because.

'Tis not unusual in the Assembly to revoke their Votes, by reason they make so much hast.
Selden, Table-Talk, p. 108.

(b) By right or justice; properly; justly.

And, as my body and my beste ouȝte to be my liegis,
So rithffully be reson my rede shulde also.
Richard the Redeless, Prol.

By reason of, on account of; for the cause of.

And by reson of gentill fader ought come gentill issue.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 660.

The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow. Ps. xc. 10.

Mr. Bradford and Mr. Collier of Plimouth came to Boston, having appointed a meeting here the week before, but by reason of foul weather were driven back.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 166.

The Parliament is adjourned to Oxford, by reason of the Sickness which increaseth exceedingly.
Howell, Letters, I. iv. 20.

I cannot go so fast as I would, by reason of this burden that is on my back. Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 89.

We elected a president, as many of the ancients did their kings, by reason of his height.
Addison, Spectator, No. 108.

Discourse of reason, the operation or faculty of reasoning, or the conscious and voluntary use of beliefs already had to determine others.

O God! a beast, that wants discourse of reason
Would have mourn'd longer. Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 150.

Discursive reason, reason in the sense 3 (d); the dianoetic faculty, or faculty of drawing conclusions and inferences. Compare intuitive reason, below.

Whence the soul
Reason receives, and reason is her being,
Discursive or intuitive; discourse
Is oftest yours, the latter most is ours,
Differing but in degree, of kind the same.
Milton, P. L., v. 487.

Diversity of reason†. See diversity.—Ens of reason. See ens.—False reason, an inconclusive reason.—Feast of reason. (a) Delightful intellectual discourse.

There St. John mingles with my friendly bowl
The feast of reason and the flow of soul.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 128.

(b) [caps.] In French hist., an act of worship of human reason, represented by a woman as the goddess of Reason, performed on November 10th, 1793, in the cathedral of Notre Dame, and also in other churches (renamed temples of Reason) in France on that and succeeding days. The worship of Reason was designed to take the place of the suppressed Christian worship; recognition of the Supreme Being was restored through the influence of Robespierre.—Generative reason. See generative.—In reason. (a) In the view or estimation of reason; reasonably; justly; properly.

His unjust unkindness, that in all reason should have quenched her love. Shak., M. for M., iii. 1. 250.

The Oath which binds him to performance of his ought in reason to contain the summ of what his chief trust and Office is. Milton, Eikonoklastes, vi.

(b) Agreeable to reason; reasonable; just; proper: as, I will do anything in reason.—Intuitive reason, reason in the sense 3 (e); the noetic faculty, or sense of primal truth. See quotation under discursive reason.—Logical reason, discursive reason.—Objective reason. See objective.—Out of reason, without or beyond reason; devoid of cause or warrant.

If we desyre no redresse of dedis before,
We may boldly vs byld with bostis out of Reason.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 2222.

Practical reason. See practical.—Principle of sufficient reason, the proposition that nothing happens without a good and sufficient reason why it should be as it is and not otherwise. This doctrine denies, first, that anything happens by chance or spontaneity, and, second, that anything happens by irrational and brute force. It is inextricably bound up with the principle of the identity of indiscernibles. It requires that there should be a general reason why the constants of nature should have the precise values they have. It is in conflict with every form of nominalism, teaching that general reasons are not only real, but that they exclusively govern phenomena; and it appears to lead logically to an idealism of a Platonic type. It is not the mere statement that everything has a cause, but that those causes act according to general and rational principles, without any element of blind compulsion. The principle was first enunciated by Leibnitz in 1710, and has met with extraordinary favor, the more so as it has often been misunderstood.—Pure reason, reason strictly a priori; reason quite independent of experience. See pure, 8.

Reason is pure if in reasoning we admit only definitions and propositions known a priori.
Baumeister, Philosophia Definitiva (trans.), 2d ed., 1738, § 823.

Pure reason is that faculty which supplies the principles of knowing anything entirely a priori.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Müller, p. 11.

Ratiocinant reason. (a) A reason or cause as it exists in the mind: opposed to ratiocinate reason.

I have not asked this question without cause causing, and reason truly very ratiocinant.
Urquhart, Rabelais, III. vi. (Davies.)

(b) The human understanding; the discursive reason.—Ratiocinate reason, a reason as an element of the quiddity of things, according to the Aristotelian conception: opposed to ratiocinant reason.—Reason of state, a political motive for a public act which cannot be accounted for publicly; a concealed ground of action by a government or a public officer in some matter concerning the state's welfare or safety, or the maintenance of a policy.—Relation of reason. See relation.—Right reason, reason in sense 5, above.—Rime nor reason. See rime[1].—Speculative reason, reason employed about supersensuous things.—Subjective reason, reason which is determined by the subject or agent.—Sufficient reason. See principle of sufficient reason, above.—Theoretical reason, reason as productive of cognition.—There is no reason but†, there is no reason why not; it is inevitable; it cannot be helped.

There is no reason but I shall be blind.
Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 4. 212.

To do one reason†. (a) To do what is desired, or what one desires; act so as to give satisfaction.

Lord Titus, by your leave, this maid is mine.
. . . [I am] resolved withal
To do myself this reason and this right.
Shak., Tit. And., i. 1. 279.

Strike home, and do me reason in thy heart. Dryden.

(b) See do[1].—To have reason, to have reason or right on one's side; be in the right. [A Gallicism.]

Mr. Mechlin has reason. Foote, Commissary, iii. 1.

To hear reason, to yield to reasoning or argument; accept a reason or reasons adduced; act according to advice.

Con. You should hear reason.
D. John. . . . What blessing brings it?
Con. If not a present remedy, at least a patient sufferance. Shak., Much Ado, i. 3. 6.

To stand to reason. See stand.—Syn. 1. Inducement, etc. (see motive), account, object, purpose, design.

Condescends, even, to reason this point. Brougham.

2. To give reasons for; support by argument; make a plea for: often with out: as, to reason out a proposition or a claim.

This boy, that cannot tell what he would have,
But kneels and holds up hands for fellowship,
Does reason our petition with more strength
Than thou hast to deny 't. Shak., Cor., v. 3. 176.

3. To persuade by reasoning or argument.

Men that will not be reasoned into their senses may yet be laughed or drolled into them. Sir R. L'Estrange.

4†. To hold argument with; engage in speech or discussion; talk with; interrogate.

reason[2]†, n. An obsolete spelling of raisin[1]. In the following passage it is apparently applied to some other fruit than the grape.

A medlar and a hartichoke,
A crab and a small reason.
Cotgrave, Wits Interpreter (1671), p. 219. (Nares.) reasonable (rē′zn-a-bl), a. [< ME. resonable, resunable, resnabyl, resnable, renable, runnable, < OF. resonable, raisonnable, regnable, resnable, rationable, F. raisonnable = Pr. razonable = Cat. rahonable = Sp. razonable = Pg. razoavel = It. razionabile, < L. rationabilis, reasonable, < ratio(n-), reason, calculation: see reason[1] and -able.] 1. Having the faculty of reason; endowed with reason; rational, as opposed to brute.

If he have wit enough to keep himself warm, let him bear it for a difference between himself and his horse; for it is all the wealth that he hath left, to be known a reasonable creature. Shak., Much Ado, i. 1. 71.

2. Characterized by the use of reason; amenable to reason or sound sense; not senseless, foolish, or extravagant in thought or action.

Hir maners might no man amend;
Of tong she was trew and renable,
And of hir semblant soft and stabile.
Ywaine and Gawaine (Ritson's Metr. Rom., I. 10), l. 208.
[(Piers Plowman, Notes, p. 17.)

The adjective reasonable . . . denotes a character in which reason (taking it in its largest acceptation) possesses a decided ascendant over the temper and passions; and implies no particular propensity to a display of the discursive power, if indeed it does not exclude the idea of such a propensity. D. Stewart, Human Mind, ii. 10, note.

3. Conformable to or required by reason; due to or resulting from good judgment; rationally sound, sensible, natural, etc.

Ther doth no wyghte nothing so resonable
That nys harme in her [jealousy's] ymagynynge.
Chaucer, Complaint of Venus, l. 35.

I beseech you . . . present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. Rom. xii. 1.

A law may be reasonable in itself, though a man does not allow it. Swift.

The terrors of the child are quite reasonable, and add to his loveliness. Emerson, Courage.

4. Not exceeding the bounds of reason or common sense; moderate; tolerable.

I will marry her upon any reasonable demands.
Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1. 233.

5. Moderate in amount or price; not high or dear: as, reasonable charges or prices; reasonable goods.—6. In law, befitting a person of reason or sound sense; such as a prudent man would exercise or act upon in his own affairs: as, reasonable care; reasonable diligence; reasonable cause.—7†. Calculable; computable; hence, detailed; itemized.

And rekene byfore reson a resonable acounte,
What one hath, what another hath, and what hy hadde bothe. Piers Plowman (C), xiv. 35.

8†. Talkative; ready in conversation.

Lo! how goodly spak this knight . .
I . . . gan me aqueynte
With him, and fond him so tretable,
Right wonder skilful and resonable.
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 534.

Proof beyond a reasonable doubt, such proof as will produce an abiding conviction to a moral certainty, so that a prudent man would feel safe to act upon that conviction in matters of the highest concern to his personal interests.—Reasonable aid, a euphemistic expression for aid[1], 3, corresponding to the term benevolence as used for forced loans or gifts.—Reasonable alms. See alms.—Reasonable doubt, in law, doubt for which a pertinent reason can be assigned; that state of a case which, after the entire comparison and consideration of the evidence, leaves the minds of jurors in that condition that they cannot say they feel an abiding conviction, to a moral certainty, of the truth of the charge. Shaw, C. J.—Reasonable dower. See dower[2], 2.—Syn. Rational, Reasonable. See rational.

reasonable† (rē′zn-a-bl), adv. [< reasonable, a.] Reasonably.

The Library of the Sorbonne is a very long and large Gallery, reasonable well stored with Books.
Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 128.

reasonableness (rē′zn-a-bl-nes), n. The character of being reasonable; conformity to or compliance with the requirements of reason; agreeableness to rational ideas or principles.

The method of inwardness and the secret of self-renouncement, working in and through this element of mildness, produced the total impression of his [Jesus's] "epieikeia," or sweet reasonableness.
M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, vii. § 5.

reasonably (rē′zn-a-bli), adv. [ME. resonably, renably; < reasonable + -ly[2].] 1. In a reasonable manner; agreeably to reason; with good sense or judgment.

And speke as renably and faire and wel
As to the Phitonissa did Samuel.
Chaucer, Friar's Tale, l. 211.

The abuse of the judicial functions that were properly and reasonably assumed by the House was scandalous and notorious. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., iii.

2. Within the bounds of reason; with good reason or cause; justly; properly.

Whate'er Lord Harry Percy then had said . . .
May reasonably die. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 3. 74.

It might seem that an egg which has succeeded in being fresh has done all that can reasonably be expected of it.
H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 248.

3. To a reasonable extent; in a moderately good degree; fairly; tolerably.

Verely she was heled, and left her styltes thore,
And on her fete wente home resonably well.
Joseph of Arimathie (E. E. T. S.), p. 47.

As a general rule, Providence seldom vouchsafes to mortals any more than just that degree of encouragement which suffices to keep them at a reasonably full exertion of their powers. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, iii.

reasoned (rē′znd), p. a. Characterized by or based upon reasoning; following a logical or rational method; carefully argued or studied.

reasoner (rē′zn-ėr), n. [< reason[1] + -er[1]. Cf. F. raisonneur = Pr. razonador = Sp. razonador = Pg. raciocinador = It. ragionatore, < ML. rationator, a reasoner, < rationare, reason: see reason[1], v.] One who reasons or argues, or exercises his reasoning powers; one who considers a subject argumentatively.

They are very bad reasoners, and vehemently given to opposition. Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iii. 2.

reasonfully† (rē′zn-fûl-i), adv. [ME., < reason[1] + -ful + -ly[2].] With full reason; most reasonably.

So then reasonfulli maye we sey that mercy both right and lawe passeth. Testament of Love, iii.

reasoning (rē′zn-ing), n. [Verbal n. of reason[1], v.] 1. The use of the faculty of reason; discriminative thought or discussion in regard to a subject; rational consideration.—2. A presentation of reasons or arguments; an argumentative statement or expression; a formal discussion.

Hear now my reasoning, and hearken. Job xiii. 6.

3†. Discussion; conversation; discourse.

Then there arose a reasoning among them, which of them should be greatest. Luke ix. 46.

Chain of reasoning. See chain.—Deductive, diagrammatic, dilemmatic, Fermatian reasoning. See the adjectives.—Syn. Reasoning, Argumentation. Reasoning is much broader than argumentation. The latter is confined to one side of the question, or, in another sense, supposes a proposition, supported by arguments on the affirmative side and attacked by arguments on the negative. Reasoning may be upon one side of a proposition, and is then the same as argumentation; but it may also be the method by which one reaches a belief, and thus a way of putting together the results of investigation: as, the reasoning in Euclid, or in Butler's Analogy; the reasoning by which a thief justifies himself in stealing.

A piece of reasoning is like a suspended chain, in which link is joined to link by logical dependence.
J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 158.

A poem does not admit argumentation, though it does admit development of thought. Coleridge, Table-Talk.

reasonless (rē′zn-les), a. [< reason[1] + -less.] 1. Lacking the faculty of reason; irrational, as an animal. [Rare.]

The reasonless creatures [the two kine] also do the will of their maker.
Bp. Hall, Contemplations (ed. Tegg, 1836), II. 144.

2. Deficient in reason or judgment; lacking in good sense; unreasoning. [Archaic.]

When any of them [animals] dieth, it is . . . buried in a holy place, the reasonlesse men howling and knocking their breasts in the exequies of these vnreasonable beasts.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 574.

3. Not marked or justified by reason; senseless; causeless; unwarranted.

This proffer is absurd and reasonless.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 4. 137.

reason-piece (rē′zn-pēs), n. [A corruption of raising-piece.] In building, a timber lying under the ends of beams in the side of a house; a wall-plate.

Let me fore-warn'd each sign, each system learn,
That I my people's danger may discern,
Ere 'tis too late wish'd health to reassure.
Churchill, Gotham, iii.

But let me often to these solitudes Retire, and in thy presence reassure
My feeble virtue. Bryant, Forest Hymn.

2. To give renewed assurance to; free from doubt or apprehension; restore to confidence.

They rose with fear, and left the unfinished feast,
Till dauntless Pallas re-assured the rest.
Dryden, Æneid, viii. 146.

3. Same as reinsure.

reassurer (rē-a-shŏr′ėr), n. One who reassures, or assures or insures anew.

reassuringly (rē-a-shŏr′ing-li), adv. In a reassuring manner; so as to reassure.

Let us cut up bushes and briars, pile them before the door and set fire to them, and smoke that auld devil's dam as if she were to be reisted for bacon.
Scott, Black Dwarf, ix.

They bequeath so great sums for masses, and dirges, and trentals, . . . that their souls may at the last be had to heaven, though first for a while they be reezed in purgatory.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 65.

II. intrans. 1†. To become 'reasty' or rancid, as dried meat. Cath. Ang., p. 304.

The scalding of Hogges keepeth the flesh whitest, plumpest, and fullest, neither is the Bacon so apt to reast as the other; besides, it will make it somewhat apter to take salt. Markham, Countrey Farme (1616), p. 107.

2. To take offense. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

reasted (rēs′ted), p. a. [Also *reested, reestit, reased, reezed, rezed, reised; < ME. rested, with -ed for equiv. OF. -é in resté: see reasty.] Become rusty and rancid, as dried meat. Cath. Ang., p. 304.

Or once a weeke, perhaps, for novelty,
Reez'd bacon soords shall feaste his family.
Bp. Hall, Satires, IV. ii.

What accademick starved satyrist
Would gnaw rez'd bacon?
Marston, Scourge of Villanie, iii. (Nares.)

Of beef and reised bacon store,
That is most fat and greasy,
We have likewise to feed our chaps,
And make them glib and easy.
King Alfred and the Shepherd. (Nares.)

rebaptism (rē-bap′tizm), n. [< re- + baptism.] A new or second baptism. It has always been the generally accepted teaching that to perform the ceremony on one known to have been really baptized already is sacrilegious; and what is or may be rebaptism is permissible only because the validity of the previous ceremony has been denied, or because the fact of its administration, or the manner in which it was performed, is disputed or doubtful. Conditional or hypothetical baptism is administered in the Roman Catholic Church to all candidates coming from Protestant churches, under a form beginning "If thou hast not been baptized," the question of the validity of Protestant baptism being held in abeyance. Such rebaptism is also administered in the Anglican churches in special cases, as where the candidate himself desires it. Baptist churches require rebaptism of all who have not been immersed on profession of faith.

rebaptist (rē-bap′tist), n. [< re- + baptist.] One who baptizes again, or who undergoes baptism a second time; also, a Baptist or Anabaptist.

A musical instrument, the earliest known form of the viol class. It had a pear-shaped body, which was solid above, terminating in a slender neck and a carved head, and hollow below, with sound-holes and a sound-post. The number of strings was usually three, but was sometimes only one or two. They were tuned in fifths, and sounded by a bow. The tone was harsh and loud. The rebec is known to have been in use in Europe as early as the eighth century. Its origin is disputed, but is usually attributed to the Moors of Spain. It was the precursor of the true viol in all its forms, and continued in vulgar use long after the latter was artistically established.

When the merry bells ring round,
And the jocund rebecks sound
To many a youth, and many a maid.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 94.

As he was robbed on; ay, and pay his hurts.
B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, iii. 1.

rebus (rē′bus), n. [< OF. rebus, F. rebus, a rebus; derived, according to Ménage, from satirical pieces which the clerics of Picardy composed at the annual carnival, and which, as they referred to current topics, follies, etc., were entitled de rebus quæ geruntur, 'of things which are going on'; otherwise explained as words represented 'by things'; < L. rebus, abl. pl. of res, a thing, an object: see real[1].] 1. A puzzle or riddle consisting of words or phrases represented by figures or pictures of objects whose names resemble in sound those words or phrases or the syllables of which they are composed; an enigmatical representation of words by means of figures or pictures suggestive of them.—2. In her.: (a) A bearing or succession of bearings which make up the name or a word expressing the profession or office of the bearer. The origin of many bearings in early heraldry is such an allusion; and on the other hand many proper names have been derived from the bearings, these having been granted originally to persons having a name or territorial designation which a descendant, perhaps of a younger branch, abandoned for the allusive surname suggested by the bearing: thus, in the case of the name Tremain, and the bearing of three human hands, either the bearing or the name may have originated the other. Also called allusive arms.

Rebus of Bishop Oldham ("owldom"), Exeter Cathedral

Excellent have been the conceipt[s] of some citizens, who, wanting armes, have coined themselves certaine devices as neere as may be alluding to their names, which we call rebus.

H. Peacham, The Gentleman's Exercise (1634), p. 155. [(Skeat.)

(b) A motto in which a part of the phrase is expressed by representations of objects instead of by words. In a few rare cases the whole motto is thus given. Such mottos are not commonly borne with the escutcheon and crest, but form rather a device or impresa, as the figure of a sun-dial preceded by the words "we must," meaning "we must die all."

You will have your rebus still, mine host.

B. Jonson, New Inn, i. 1.

rebus (rē'bus), v. t. [< rebus, n.] To mark with a rebus; indicate by a rebus. Fuller, Ch. Hist., IV. iv. 34.

The more heartily did one disdain his disdain, and recalcitrate his tricks. De Quincey.

recalcitration (rē-kal-si-trā'shọn), n. [< recalcitrate + -ion.] The act of recalcitrating; opposition; repugnance.

Inwardly chuckling that these symptoms of recalcitration had not taken place until the fair malecontent was, as he mentally termed it, under his thumb, Archibald coolly replied, "That the hills were none of his making."

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xli.

recalesce (rē-ka-les'), v. i.; pret. and pp. recalesced, ppr. recalescing. [< L. re-, again, + calescere, grow hot, inceptive of calere, be hot: see calid.] To glow with increased incandescence owing to a sudden liberation of heat.

★recalescence (rē-ka-les'ens), n. [< recalesce + -ence.] Renewed calescence; reglow; specifically, in physics, a phenomenon exhibited by iron as it cools gradually from a white heat (point of high incandescence): at certain temperatures, as at 1,000°, the cooling seems to be arrested, and the iron glows more brilliantly for a short time. It has also been found that certain other properties of the metal, magnetic and electrical, undergo a sudden change at these points of recalescence.

recall (rē-kâl'), v. t. [< re- + call[1].] 1. To call back from a distance; summon or cause to return or to be returned; bring back by a call, summons, or demand: as, to recall an ambassador or a ship; we cannot recall our lost youth.

If Henry were recall'd to life again,
These news would cause him once more yield the ghost.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., i. 1. 66.

At the expiration of six years he was suddenly recalled to his native country by the death of his father.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 5.

2. To call back to mind or perception; renew the memory or experience of; bring again, as something formerly experienced.

How soon

Harper's Mag., LXXII. 94.

receipt (rē-sēt′), n. [Formerly also receit (the p being inserted in imitation of the L. original, and the proper spelling being receit, like conceit, deceit); (a) < ME. receit, receyt, receite, receipt, recipe, < AF. receite, OF. recete, recepte, reçoite, F. recette = Pr. recepta = Sp. receta = Pg. receita = It. ricetta, f., receipt, recipe, < ML. recepta, f., receipt, recipe, money received, a treasury, a right of pasture, lit. (sc. res, a thing) 'a thing received,' fem. of L. receptus, pp. of recipere, receive; (b) in defs. 5 and 6, also reset (see reset[1]), < ME. recet, reset, resset, rescet, resate, < OF. recet, receit, recept, reset, reçoit, rechet, rechiet, etc., = Sp. recepto = It. ricetto, m., a retreat, refuge, abode, asylum (see recheat), < L. receptus, m., a receiving, place of retreat, refuge, < recipere, pp. receptus, receive: see receive. Cf. reset[1] and recheat, doublets of receipt; cf. also recept.] 1. A thing received; that which is received by transfer; the amount or quantity of what is received from other hands: as, the receipts of cotton at a port.

Three parts of that receipt I had for Calais Disbursed I duly to his highness' soldiers.
Shak., Rich. II., i. 1. 126.

He wintered for the second time in Dublin; where his own pieces, and Macklin's "Love-a-la-Mode," brought great receipts to Crow-Street theatre.
W. Cooke, Memoirs of S. Foote, I. 51.

2. The act or state of receiving by transfer or transmission; a taking of that which is delivered or passed over; a getting or obtaining: as, the receipt of money or of a letter; he is in the receipt of a good income.

Christ in us is that receipt of the same medicine whereby we are every one particularly cured.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 55.

Villain, thou did'st deny the gold's receipt.
Shak., C. of E., ii. 2. 17.

3. A written acknowledgment of having received something specified, with date, source, signature, and such other particulars as the case requires. A receipt may be for something received as a trust or a purchase, or for money or other valuable thing taken either in part or in full payment of a debt. At common law a mere unsealed receipt, though expressed to be in full for a debt, does not by its own force operate to discharge the debt if the payment in fact be of a part only. A receipt is not deemed a contract within the rule that a written contract cannot be varied by oral evidence.

4. A formula or prescription for the making of something, or the production of some effect; a statement of that which is to be taken or done for some purpose: distinguished from recipe by the common restriction of that word to medical or related uses: as, a receipt for a pudding; a receipt for gaining popularity.

Come, sir, the sight of Golde
Is the most sweet receit for melancholy,
And will reuiue your spirits.
Heywood, Woman Killed with Kindness (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, II. 107).

We have the receipt of fern-seed, we walk invisible.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 1. 96.

No Receipt can Human-kind relieve,
Doom'd to decrepit Age without Reprieve.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

5†. Reception; admittance; a granting of entrance or admission.

He wayted hym aboute, & wylde hit hym thogt, & sege no syngne of resette.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 2164.

Ther [in heaven] entreȝ non to take reset,
That bereȝ any spot.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), i. 1066.

Come, cave, become my grave; come, death, and lend Receipt to me within thy bosom dark.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

6†. A place for the reception of persons or things; a place where anything is received or taken in; a station or a receptacle for lodgment.

Men han made a litylle Resceyt, besyde a Pylere of that Chirche, for to resceyve the Offrynges of Pilgrymes.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 112.

Go forth, tary we not behynd,
Vnto som receit nye the wodes lynde,
Wher we mow thys tym receyued to be.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 159.

He saw Levi . . . sitting at the receipt of custom [place of toll, R. V.]. Mark ii. 14.

Memory, the warder of the brain,
Shall be a fume, and the receipt of reason
A limbeck only. Shak., Macbeth, i. 7. 66.

7†. Power of receiving or taking in; extent of accommodation; fitness for holding or containing.

The foresaid ships were of an huge and incredible capacitie and receipt. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 593.

In things of great receipt with ease we prove Among a number one is reckon'd none.
Shak., Sonnets, cxxxvi.

Such be the capacity and receipt of the mind of man.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 9.

Accountable receipt. See accountable. =Syn. Recipe, etc. See reception.

receipt (rē-sēt′), v. t. [Also in technical legal use reset (see reset[1]); < ME. recetten, reseten; from the noun: see receipt, n.] 1†. To receive; harbor.

And ȝe hit make, and that me greves,
A den to reset inne theves.
Cursor Mundi, MS. Coll. Trin. Cantab., f. 91. (Halliwell.)

My lorde hym recetted in hys castell
For the dewkys dethe oton.
MS. Cantab., Ff. ii. 38, f. 220. (Halliwell.)

2. To give a receipt for; acknowledge in writing the payment of: as, to receipt a bill (usually by writing upon the bill "Received payment" and the creditor's signature).

receiptable (rē-sē′ta-bl), a. [< receipt + -able.] Capable of being receipted; for which a receipt may be granted.

receipt-book (rē-sēt′bůk), n. A book containing receipts, in either sense 3 or sense 4.

receiptment (rē-sēt′ment), n. [< receipt + -ment.] In old Eng. law, the receiving or harboring of a felon with knowledge on the part of the harborer of the commission of a felony. Burrill.

receiptor (rē-sē′tọr), n. [< receipt + -or[1].] One who gives a receipt; specifically, in law, a person to whom property is bailed by an officer, who has attached it upon mesne process, to answer to the exigency of the writ and satisfy the judgment, the obligation of the receiptor being to have it forthcoming on demand. Wharton.

receit†, n. A former spelling of receipt (and of the ultimately identical recheat).

receivability (rē-sē-va-bil′i-ti), n. [< receivable + -ity (see -bility).] The quality of being receivable. Imp. Dict.

receivable (rē-sē′va-bl), a. [< F. recevable (cf. Pg. recebivel = It. ricevevole), receivable; as receive + -able.] 1. Capable of being received; fit for reception or acceptance.—2. Awaiting receipt of payment; that is to be paid: as, bills receivable. See bill payable, bill receivable, under bill[3].

receivableness (rē-sē′va-bl-nes), n. The character of being receivable; capability of being received.

receive (rē-sēv′), v.; pret. and pp. received, ppr. receiving. [Early mod. E. also receeve, receave; < ME. receiven, receyven, reseyven, resseyven, resceyven, resayven, resaven, < OF. recever, recevoir, reçoivre, F. recevoir = Pr. recebre = Sp. recibir = Pg. receber = It. ricevere, receive, < L. recipere, pp. receptus, take back, get back, regain, recover, take to oneself, admit, accept, receive, take in, assume, allow, etc., < re-, back, + capere, take: see capacious. Cf. conceive, deceive, perceive. Hence ult. (from the L. verb) receipt, receptacle, recipe, etc.] I. trans. 1. To take from a source or agency of transmission; get by transfer: as, to receive money or a letter; to receive gifts.

They be like Gray Friars, that will not be seen to receive bribes themselves, but have others to receive for them.
Latimer, 5th Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things.
Luke xvi. 25.

2. To take or get from a primary source: as, to receive favors or a good education; to receive an impression, a wound, or a shock.

Receives not thy nose court-odour from me?
Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 757.

The idea of solidity we receive by our touch. Locke.

No Norman or Breton ever saw a Mussulman, except to give and receive blows on some Syrian field of battle.
Macaulay, Von Ranke's Hist. Popes.

3. To take notice of on coming or appearing; greet the advent of; salute or treat upon approach: as, to receive an actor with applause; to receive news joyfully.

To Westmynstur the kyng be water did glide,
Worshypfully resayvid with procession in frett,
Resayvid with reverence, his dewte not denye.
MS. Bibl. Reg. 17 D. xv. (Halliwell.)

My father was received with open arms by all his old friends. Lady Holland, Sydney Smith, vi.

4. To take or consider favorably; admit as credible, worthy, acceptable, etc.; give admission or recognition to: as, to receive a person into one's friendship; a received authority.

What he hath seen and heard, that he testifieth; and no man receiveth his testimony. John iii. 32.

He is a Gentleman so receiv'd, so courted, and so trusted.
Steele, Tender Husband, i. 1.

Every person who should now leave received opinions . . . might be regarded as a chimerical projector.
Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 4.

5. To admit for intercourse or entertainment; grant audience or welcome to; give a friendly reception to: as, to receive an ambassador or guests.

The quen with hire companie com him a-gens, & resseyued as reali as swiche rinkes ouȝt.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 3939.

It was so fre that Men resceyved there alle manere of Fugityfes of other places for here evyl Dedis.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 66.

They kindled a fire, and received us every one, because of the present rain, and because of the cold. Acts xxviii. 2.

6. To take in or on; give entrance to; hold; contain; have capacity for: as, a box to receive contributions.

The brasen altar that was before the Lord was too little to receive the burnt offerings. 1 Ki. viii. 64.

This cave, fashion'd
By provident Nature in this solid rock
To be a den for beasts, alone receives me.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, iv. 1.

7†. To perceive; comprehend; take into the mind.

To be received plain, I'll speak more gross.
Shak., M. for M., ii. 4. 82.

8. In law: (a) To take by transfer in a criminal manner; accept the custody or possession of from a known thief: as, to receive stolen goods.

You must restore all stoln goods you receiv'd.
Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, v. 3.

(b) To admit as pertinent; take into consideration; permit the reception of: as, the court refused to receive the evidence, and ordered it to be stricken out.—To receive the canvas†. See canvas.—To receive the coif. See coif.—Syn. 1 and 2. Receive, Take, Accept. These words are in the order of strength in regard to the willingness with which the thing in question is received, etc., but none of them is warm. One may receive a letter, a challenge to a duel, a remittance, detriment, or a wound; the word thus may be wholly neuter. One may take cold, but, more often, take that which he might refuse, as a present, a bribe, offense, a pinch of snuff, or an orange. One may accept one's fate, but even then the word means a mental consent, a movement of mind; more often it means to receive with some willingness, as to accept a proposition, an invitation, or an offer. An offer, etc., may be received and not accepted.

II. intrans. 1. To be a receiver or recipient; come into custody or possession of something by transfer.

Every one shall receive of thy words. Deut. xxxiii. 3.

Freely ye have received, freely give. Mat. x. 8.

2. To give, or take part in holding, a reception; greet and entertain visitors, especially at certain fixed times.

As this name was called the person presented advanced, bowed first to the prince and then separately to the two members of the royal family who were receiving with him.
T. C. Crawford, English Life, p. 38.

received (rē-sēvd'), a. In entom., projecting between other parts.—Received scutellum, a scutellum which lies between the bases of the elytra, as in most beetles.

receivedness (rē-sē'ved-nes), n. The state of being received; general allowance or belief.

Others will, upon account of the receivedness of this opinion, think it rather worth to be examined, than acquiesced in. Boyle.

receiver (rē-sē'vėr), n. [Early mod. E. also receever, receaver; < ME. resaver, receyvour, < OF. recevour, receveur, F. receveur, < recevoir, receive: see receive.] 1. One who or that which receives, in any general sense; a recipient; a receptacle; a taker or container of anything transmitted: as, a receiver of taxes; a receiver for odds and ends.

We are receivers through grace and mercy, authors through merit and desert we are not, of our own salvation. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v., App. 1.

But in this thankless World the Givers
Are envy'd ev'n by the Receivers.
Cowley, Pindaric Odes, i. 11.

This invention covers a combined grass receiver and dumper to catch and carry the grass while the lawn mower is being operated. Sci. Amer., N. S., LXII. 364.

2. An officer appointed to receive public money; a treasurer; specifically, a person appointed by a court of equity or other judicial tribunal to take, pending litigation, the custody and management or disposal of property in controversy, or to receive the rents and profits of land or the produce of other property.—3. One who, for purposes of profit or concealment, takes stolen goods from a thief, knowing them to be stolen, thus making himself a party to the crime.

Were there noe receavers, there would be noe theeves.
Spenser, State of Ireland.

4. In chem.: (a) A vessel for receiving and containing the product of distillation. (b) A vessel for receiving and containing gases.—5. The glass vessel placed on the plate of an air-pump, in order to be exhausted of air: so named because it is the recipient of those things on which experiments are made. See air-pump.—6. The receiving magnet of an electric telegraph, the receiving apparatus of a telephone, or the like.—Exhausted receiver. See exhaust.—Florentine receiver. See Florentine.—Knitting-needle receiver, an apparatus consisting of a magnetizing coil with a knitting-needle in its axis, used by Reis as a telephonic receiver. The action of this receiver depends on Page's discovery that an iron bar gives a sharp click when magnetized; the rapid succession of clicks in the receiver, corresponding to the successive make-and-breaks of the Reis transmitter, reproduces the sound.—Mail-bag receiver and discharger. See mail-catcher.—Receiver and manager. See manager, 4.—Receiver of the fines, formerly, in England, an officer who received the money of all such as compounded with the crown on original writs sued out of Chancery.—Receiver's certificates, evidences of debt, issued by a receiver of property in litigation, for the discharge of obligations incurred in the management of it, to be redeemed out of its proceeds when finally disposed of or restored to its owners. Such certificates may be authorized by the proper court, and made a lien upon the property, when the expenses connected with it cannot be otherwise met without detriment.—Receivers of wreck, officers appointed by the British Board of Trade for the preservation of wreck, etc., for the benefit of the shipping interests. They were formerly called receivers of droits of admiralty.

receiver-general (rē-sē'vėr-jen'ė-ral), n. In some countries or states, an officer who receives the public revenues in general or in a particular territory: in some of the United States, an additional title of the State treasurer.

receivership (rē-sē'vėr-ship), n. [< receiver + -ship.] The office of a receiver of public money, or of money or other property in litigation; the collection and care of funds awaiting final distribution by legal process.

receiving (rē-sē'ving), n. [< ME. receyving; verbal n. of receive, v.] The act of one who receives, in any sense of that verb.—Receiving apparatus or instrument, in teleg., any appliance used at a telegraph-station, by the action of which the signals transmitted from another station are rendered perceptible to any of the senses of the receiving operator.—Receiving tubes of the kidney, the straight tubules of the kidney.

receiving-house (rē-sē'ving-hous), n. A house where letters or parcels are received for transmission; a place of deposit for things to be forwarded; a depot. [Great Britain.]

receiving-magnet (rē-sē'ving-mag″net), n. See magnet.

receiving-office (rē-sē'ving-of″is), n. In Great Britain, a branch post-office where letters, parcels, etc., may be posted, but from which no delivery is made to persons addressed.

receiving-ship (rē-sē'ving-ship), n. A ship stationed permanently in a harbor to receive recruits for the navy until they can be transferred to a cruising ship.

receiving-tomb (rē-sē'ving-töm), n. Same as receiving-vault.

receiving-vault (rē-sē'ving-vâlt), n. A building or other structure in which the bodies of the dead may be placed temporarily when it is impossible or inconvenient to inter them in the usual manner.

recency (rē'sen-si), n. [< ML. recentia, < L. recen(t-)s, new, fresh: see recent.] The state or quality of being recent; recentness; newness; lateness; freshness.

So also a scirrhus in its recency, whilst it is in its augment, requireth milder applications than the confirmed or inveterate one. Wiseman, Surgery, i. 19.

An impression of recency is given which some minds are clearly unable to shake off.
Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 198.

recense (rē-sens'), v. t.; pret. and pp. recensed, ppr. recensing. [< OF. recenser, number, count, peruse, muster, review, F. recenser, number, take the census of, = Pr. recensar = Pg. recensear, examine, survey, < L. recensere, recount, examine closely, review, muster, revise, etc., < re-, again, + censere, think, deem, judge: see census.] To review; revise. [Rare.]

Sixtus and Clemens, at a vast expence, had an assembly of learned divines to recense and adjust the Latin Vulgate.
Bentley.

recension (rē-sen'shọn), n. [< F. recension, < L. recensio(n-), an enumeration, reviewing, recension, < recensere, review: see recense.] 1. Review; examination; enumeration. [Obsolete or rare.]

In this recension of monthly flowers, it is to be understood for the whole period that any flower continues, from its first appearing to its final withering.
Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense, January.

2. A critical or methodical revision, as of the text of a book or document; alteration of a text according to some authority, standard, or principle; a reëditing or systematic revisal.

He who . . . spends nine years in the elaboration and recension of his book . . . will find that he comes too late.
G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xxi.

3. A text established by critical or systematic revision; an edited version.

The genuine ballad-book thus published was so successful that in less than ten years three editions or recensions of it appeared. Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 115.

Using the ancient versions in this way, we can recover a recension (or recensions) differing more or less widely from that represented by the traditional Hebrew text.
Contemporary Rev., L. 595.

4. A critical examination, as of a book; a review; a critique.

He was . . . bitterly convinced that his old acquaintance Carp had been the writer of that depreciatory recension which was kept locked in a small drawer of Mr. Casaubon's desk, and also in a small dark closet of his verbal memory. George Eliot, Middlemarch, xxix.

recensionist (rē-sen'shọn-ist), n. [< recension + -ist.] One who reviews or revises, as the text of an ancient author; an editor.

recent (rē'sent), a. [< OF. recent, F. récent = Pr. recent = Sp. reciente = Pg. It. recente, < L. recen(t-)s, fresh, new; (a) in one view, < re- + -cen(t-)s, supposed to be allied to W. cynt, first, earliest, Skt. kaniyāns, smaller, kanistha, smallest (cf. Russ. po-chinatĭ, begin); (b) in another view, orig. ppr. from a root rec* = Zend √ raç, come (cf. recens a victoria, 'just coming from a victory'; Rhodo recentes Romam venerunt, 'they came to Rome just from Rhodes,' etc.: see def. 5).] 1. Of or pertaining to time just before the present; not long past in occurrence or existence; lately happening or being; newly appearing, done, or made: as, recent events; recent importations; recent memories; recent news; a recent speech.—2. Of modern date, absolutely or relatively; not of primitive or remote origin; belonging to or occurring in times not far removed.—3. Still fresh in quality or existence; not old or degenerate; unchanged by time: said of things liable to rapid change, as newly gathered plants or specimens in natural history.

The odour [of essential oils] is seldom as pleasant as that of the recent plant. Ure, Dict., III. 456.

4. In geol., of or pertaining to the epoch regarded as the present from a geological point of view. Strata so called contain few, if any, fossils belonging to extinct species. The alluvial formations in the valleys are generally of recent formation, as well as most of the superficial detrital material. The deposits which belong to the Post-tertiary, or which are more recent than the Tertiary, are with difficulty classified, except for purposes of local geology. In glaciated regions, the traces of the former presence of ice adds variety to the phenomena, and complexity to the classification, of the various forms of detrital material. The existence of very ancient remains and works of man is a further element of interest in the geology of the recent formations.

5. Lately come; not long removed or separated. [Poetical and rare.]

Shall I not think that, with disorder'd charms,
All heav'n beholds me recent from thy arms?
Pope, Iliad, xiv. 382.

Amphitryon recent from the nether sphere.
Lewis, tr. of Statius's Thebaid, viii.

=Syn. 1. Late, Fresh, etc. See new.

recently (rē′sent-li), adv. At a recent time; newly; lately; freshly; not long since: as, advices recently received; a town recently built or repaired; an isle recently discovered.

recentness (rē′sent-nes), n. The state or quality of being recent; newness; freshness; recency; lateness of origin or occurrence: as, the recentness of alluvial land; the recentness of news or of events.

recept (rē′sept), n. [< L. receptum, neut. of receptus, pp. of recipere, receive: see receive. Cf. receipt.] That which is received; especially, something taken into the mind from an external source; an idea derived from observation. [Recent.]

The bridge between recept and concept is equally impassable as that between percept and concept.
Athenæum, No. 3193, p. 12.

★ receptacle (rē-sep′tā-kl, formerly also res′ep-tā-kl), n. [< OF. receptacle, F. réceptacle = Pr. receptacle = Sp. receptáculo = Pg. receptaculo = It. ricettacolo, recettaculo, < L. receptaculum, a receptacle, place to receive or store things in, < recipere, pp. receptus, receive, hold, contain: see receive.] 1. That which receives or holds anything for rest or deposit; a storing-place; a repository; a container; any space, open or closed, that serves for reception and keeping.

As in a vault, an ancient receptacle,
Where, for these many hundred years, the bones
Of all my buried ancestors are pack'd.
Shak., R. and J., iv. 3. 39.

Least his neighbor's countrey might be an harborugh or receptacle of his foes and aduersaries.
Hall, Edw. III., an. 10.

2. In bot.: (a) In a single flower, the more or less enlarged and peculiarly developed apex of the peduncle or pedicel, upon which all the organs of the flower are directly or indirectly a, Dandelion (Taraxacum Taraxacum); b, Fragaria elatior (longitudinal section); c, Cleome serrulata (longitudinal section); d, Geranium maculatum; e, Rosa rubiginosa (long. section).

Various Forms of Receptacle (r).

borne: the Linnæan and usual name: same as the more specific and proper torus of De Candolle and the thalamus of Tournefort. The receptacle varies in size and texture. In form it may be convex or conical (as most often), elongated, as in Magnolia, or concave, as in the rose; it may develop into a stipe, gynobase, disk, carpophore, or hypanthium (see these words), or it may greatly enlarge in fruit, as in the strawberry. As belonging to a single flower, sometimes termed proper receptacle. (b) In an inflorescence, the axis or rachis of a head or other short dense cluster; most often, the expanded disk-like summit of the peduncle in Compositæ (dandelion, etc.), on which are borne the florets of the head, surrounded by an involucre of bracts; a clinanthium. In contrast with the above, sometimes called common receptacle. (c) In an ovary, same as placenta, 4. (d) Among cryptogams — (1) In the vascular class, the placenta. (2) In Marchantiaceæ, one of the umbrella-like branches of the thallus, upon which the reproductive organs are borne. (3) In Fucaceæ, a part of the thallus in which conceptacles (see conceptacle) are congregated. They are either terminal portions of branches or parts sustained above water by air-bladders. (4) In Fungi, sometimes same as stroma; in Sphærioideaceæ, same as pycnidium, 1 (also the stalk of a discocarp); in Phalloideæ, the inner part of the sporophore, supporting the gleba. (5) In lichens, the cup containing the soredia.—3. In zoöl. and anat., a part or an organ which receives and contains or detains a secretion; a receptaculum: as, the gall-bladder is the receptacle of the bile.

receptacula, n. Plural of receptaculum.

receptaculaceous†, a. Same as receptacular.

receptacular (rē-sep-tak′ū-lär), a. [= F. réceptaculaire, < L. receptaculum, a receptacle: see receptacle.] 1. In bot., of or pertaining to a receptacle.—2. In zoöl. and anat., serving as a receptacle or reservoir; pertaining to a receptaculum.

receptaculite (rē-sep-tak′ū-līt), n. [< NL. Receptaculites.] A fossil of the genus Receptaculites.

Receptaculites (rē-sep-tak-ū-lī′tēz), n. [NL. (Defrance, 1827), < L. receptaculum, a receptacle (see receptacle), + -ites (see *-ite*²).] The typical genus of Receptaculitidæ.

Receptaculitidæ (rē-sep-tak-ū-lit′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Receptaculites + -idæ.] A family of fossil organisms, typified by the genus Receptaculites, the nature of which is debated. They have been referred to the silicious sponges; but the skeleton was originally calcareous, and the silicious examples are the result of replacement. They are of a spherical or pyriform shape, with a central closed cavity and an upper and lower pole, and the wall is composed of pillar-like spicules at right angles to the surface and expanded at their outer ends into rhomboidal summit-plates forming a mosaic-like outer layer. The species lived in the seas of the Silurian and Devonian epochs. Also called Receptaculidæ.

receptaculum (rē-sep-tak′ū-lum), n.; pl. receptacula (-lä). [L.: see receptacle.] In zoöl., anat., and bot., a receptacle; a reservoir of fluid; a saccular or vesicular organ to receive and retain a fluid.—Receptaculum chyli, a dilatation of the thoracic duct, situated upon the body of the first or second lumbar vertebra, into which the lymphatics of the lower extremities and the lacteals of the intestine discharge. Decay of Christian Piety.

recipiomotor (rē-sip'i-ō-mō″tor), a. [Irreg. < L. recipere, receive, + motor, mover.] Receiving a motor impulse or stimulus; afferent, as a nerve, in an ordinary sense: correlated with liberomotor and dirigomotor. See motor.

Each afferent nerve is a recipio-motor agent.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 18.

★ reciprocal (rē-sip'rō-kal), a. and n. [< NL. as if reciprocalis*, < L. reciprocus, returning, alternating, reciprocal (> It. Pg. reciproco = Sp. recíproco = OF. reciproque, > obs. E. reciprock); perhaps lit. 'moving backward and forward,' < recus* (< re-, back, + adj. formative -cus: see -ic) + procus (< pro, forward, + adj. formative -cus). Cf. reciprocous, reciprock.] I. a. 1. Moving backward and forward; alternating; reciprocating.

The stream of Jordan, south of their going over, was not supplied with any reciprocal or refluous tide out of the Dead Sea.
Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. i. 17. (Davies, under refluous.)

Obedient to the moon, he spent his date
In course reciprocal, and had his fate
Link'd to the mutual flowing of the seas.
Milton, Second Epitaph on Hobson the Carrier.

2. Mutually exchanged or exchangeable; concerning or given or owed by each (of two or more) with regard to the other or others: as, reciprocal aid; reciprocal rights, duties, or obligations; reciprocal love or admiration.

Let our reciprocal vows be remembered.
Shak., Lear, iv. 6. 267.

The Liturgy or service . . . consisteth of the reciprocal acts between God and man.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 378.

I take your gentle offer, and withal
Yield love again for love reciprocal.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, i. 2.

The king assured me of a reciprocal affection to the king my master, and of my particular welcome to his court.
Lord Herbert of Cherbury, Life (ed. Howells), p. 129.

The liberty of the enemy's fishermen in war has been protected by many French ordinances, and the English observed a reciprocal indulgence.
Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, § 170.

There is much the same relation of reciprocal dependence between judgment and reasoning as between conception and judgment.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 414.

3. Having an interchangeable character or relation; mutually equivalent or correspondent; concordant; agreeing.

Knowledge and power are reciprocal.
Bacon, Physical Fables, x., Expl., note.

Sometimes a universal affirming may be converted saving the quantity, to wit when consisting of reciprocal terms: as, every man is a rational animal, and therefore every rational animal is a man.
Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman, i. 32.

He [the king] must guide the vast and complicated machine of government, to the reciprocal advantage of all his dominions.
A. Hamilton, Works, II. 56.

Thence came her friends of either sex, and all
With whom she lived on terms reciprocal.
Crabbe, Works, V. 51.

Reciprocal consecution. See consecution.—Reciprocal cross, a reciprocal hybrid.

A reciprocal cross is a double cross between two species or varieties, one form being used in one case as the father and in the other case as the mother.
W. K. Brooks, Law of Heredity, p. 126.

Reciprocal determinant, diagrams, equation. See determinant, diagram, etc.—Reciprocal ellipsoid of expansion. See ellipsoid.—Reciprocal figures in geom., two figures of the same kind (triangles, parallelograms, prisms, pyramids, etc.) so related that two sides of the one form the extremes of an analogy of which the means are the two corresponding sides of the other.—Reciprocal functions, hybrids, matrix. See function, etc.—Reciprocal polars, two curves such that the polar of any point on either (with respect to a fixed conic) is a tangent of the other.—Reciprocal pronoun, a pronoun expressing mutual or reciprocal relation, such as Greek ἀλλήλοιν (of each other, of one another).—Reciprocal proportion. See proportion.—Reciprocal quantities, in math., those quantities which, multiplied together, produce unity.—Reciprocal ratio. See ratio.—Reciprocal screws, a pair of screws so related that a wrench about one produces no twist about the other. Given any five screws, a screw reciprocal to them all can be found.—Reciprocal terms, in logic, those terms that have the same signification, and consequently are convertible and may be used for each other.=Syn. Reciprocal, Mutual. There is a theoretical difference between these words, although it often is not important. That is mutual which is a common act on the part of both persons at the same time. Mutual is not properly applicable to physical acts or material things, as blows or gifts. Reciprocal means that one follows another, being caused by it, with emphasis upon that which is viewed as caused: as, reciprocal love or hate. See remarks under mutual as to the propriety of using mutual for common.

II. n. 1. That which is reciprocal to another thing.

No more
Ye must be made your own reciprocals
To your loved city and fair severals
Of wives and houses.
Chapman, tr. of Homer's Hymn to Apollo.

Love is ever rewarded either with the reciprocal, or with an inward or secret contempt.
Bacon, Love (ed. 1887).

2. In math., the quotient resulting from the division of unity by the quantity of which the quotient is said to be the reciprocal. Thus, the reciprocal of 4 is $\frac{1}{4}$, and conversely the reciprocal of $\frac{1}{4}$ is 4; the reciprocal of 2 is $\frac{1}{2}$, and that of $a + x$ is $1/(a+x)$. A fraction made by inverting the terms of another fraction is called the reciprocal of that other fraction: thus, $\frac{3}{5}$ is the reciprocal of $\frac{5}{3}$.—Polar reciprocals. Same as reciprocal polars. See I.

reciprocality (rē-sip-rō-kal'i-ti), n. [< reciprocal + -ity.] The state or character of being reciprocal.

An acknowledged reciprocality in love sanctifies every little freedom.
Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, II. i.

reciprocally (rē-sip'rō-kal-i), adv. 1. In a reciprocal manner; with reciprocating action or effect; alternatingly; interchangeably; correspondingly.

The Aristotelians . . . believe water and air to be reciprocally transmutable.
Boyle, Works, II. 342.

Virtue and sentiment reciprocally assist each other.
Goldsmith, Cultivation of Taste.

Faults in the life breed errors in the brain,
And these reciprocally those again.
Cowper, Progress of Error, l. 565.

2. In a reciprocal ratio or proportion; inversely. Thus, in bodies of the same weight the density is reciprocally as the magnitude—that is, the greater the magnitude the less in the same proportion the density, and the less the magnitude the greater in the same proportion the density. In geometry two magnitudes are said to be reciprocally proportional to two others when one of the first pair is to one of the second as the remaining one of the second is to the remaining one of the first.

reciprocalness (rē-sip'rō-kal-nes), n. The state or character of being reciprocal.

reciprocant (rē-sip'rō-kant), n. [< L. reciproca(t-)s, ppr. of reciprocare, move back and forth: see reciprocate.] 1. The contravariant expressing the condition of tangency between the primitive quantic and an adjoint linear form.—2. A differential invariant; a function of partial differential coefficients of n variables connected by a single relation, this function being such that, if the variables are interchanged in cyclical order, it remains unchanged except for multiplication by some nth root of unity into some power of the same root of the continued product of the first differential coefficients of one of the variables relatively to all the others. For an example, see Schwartzian, n.—Absolute reciprocant, one whose extrinsic factor reduces to unity, so that the interchange of variables produces no change except multiplication by a root of unity.—Binary reciprocant, one having two variables.—Characteristic of a reciprocant, the root of unity with which it becomes multiplied on interchange of the variables.—Character of a reciprocant, its kind with respect to its characteristic.—Circular reciprocant, a reciprocant which, equated to zero, gives the equation of a locus which is its own inverse with respect to every point.—Degree of a reciprocant, the number of factors (differential coefficients) in that term which has the greatest number. Thus, if that term is $(D_x y)^a (D_x^2 y)^b (D_x^3 y)^c$, the degree is $a + b + c$.—Even reciprocant, one whose characteristic is 1.—Extent of a reciprocant, the weight of the most advanced letter which it contains.—Homogeneous reciprocant, a reciprocant all the terms of which are of the same degree in the differential coefficients.—Homographic binary reciprocant, one which remains unaltered when x and y are changed respectively into $(Lx + M)/(x + N)$ and $(Py + Q)/(y + R)$, where the capitals are constants.—Integrable reciprocant, a reciprocant which, equated to zero, gives an equation which can be integrated.—Isobaric reciprocant, a reciprocant having the sum of the orders of the differential coefficients the same in all the terms.—Odd reciprocant, one whose characteristic is not 1.—Orthogonal reciprocant, one which remains unchanged by an orthogonal transformation of the variables.—Type of a reciprocant, the combination of its character, weight, degree, and extent.—Weight of a reciprocant, the sum of the orders, each diminished by two, of the factors (differential coefficients) of the term having the greatest weight. Thus, if that term is $(D_x y)^a (D_x^2 y)^b (D_x^3 y)^c (D_x^4 y)^d$, the weight is $= a + c + 2d$.

reciprocantive (rē-sip'rō-kan-tiv), a. [< reciprocant + -ive.] Pertaining to a reciprocant.

★ reciprocate (rē-sip'rō-kāt), v.; pret. and pp. reciprocated, ppr. reciprocating. [< L. reciprocatus, pp. of reciprocare, move back and forth, reverse (> It. reciprocare = Sp. Pg. reciprocar = F. réciproquer, reciprocate, interchange), < reciprocus, reciprocal: see reciprocal.] I. trans. 1. To cause to move back and forth; give an alternating motion to.

The sleeve is reciprocated from a rock shaft journaled in the lower aligning ends of the main frame.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LXII. 75.

2. To give and return mutually; yield or perform each to each; interchange: as, to reciprocate favors.

For 'tis a union that bespeaks Reciprocated duties.
Cowper, Friendship, l. 48.

At night men crowd the close little caffè, where they reciprocate smoke, respiration, and animal heat.
Howells, Venetian Life, iii.

3. To give or do in response; yield a return of; requite correspondingly.

It must happen, no doubt, that frank and generous women will excite love they do not reciprocate.
Margaret Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 140.

II. intrans. 1. To move backward and forward; have an alternating movement; act interchangeably; alternate.

One brawny smith the puffing bellows plies,
And draws and blows reciprocating air.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv. 249.

2. To act in return or response; do something equivalent or accordant: as, I did him many favors, but he did not reciprocate. [Colloq.]—Reciprocating engine, a form of engine in which the piston and piston-rod move back and forth in a straight line, absolutely or relatively to the cylinder, as in oscillating-cylinder engines: in contradistinction to rotatory engine. See rotatory.—Reciprocating force. See force[1].—Reciprocating motion, in mach., a motion of a part out and back over the same path, first in one direction and then in the other; also the parts which have such back-and-forth motion.—Reciprocating propeller, a propeller having a paddle which has a limited stroke and returns in the same path.—Reciprocating proposition. See proposition.

reciprocate (rē-sip′rō-kāt), a. Reciprocal.

reciprocation (rē-sip-rō-kā′shon), n. [< F. réciprocation = Sp. reciprocación = Pg. reciprocação = It. reciprocazione, < L. reciprocatio(n-), a going back upon itself, a returning by the same way, a retrogression, alternation, reflux, ebb, < reciprocare, pp. reciprocatus, move back and forth: see reciprocate.] 1. A going back and forth; alternation of movement.

When the bent spring is freed, when the raised weight falls, a converse series of motions must be effected, and this . . . would lead to a mere reciprocation [of force].
W. R. Grove, Corr. of Forces, p. 24.

2. The act of reciprocating; interchange of acts; a mutual giving and returning: as, the reciprocation of kindnesses.

We do therefore lie, in respect of each other, under a reciprocation of benefits.
Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, Prol.

3. In logic, the relation of two propositions each the converse of the other.—Polar reciprocation, in geom., the process of forming the polar reciprocal of a figure.

reciprocative (rē-sip′rō-kā-tiv), a. [< reciprocate + -ive.] Of a reciprocating character; giving and taking reciprocally.

Our four-handed cousins apparently credit their biped kinsmen with reciprocative tendencies.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIV. 111.

reciprocatory (rē-sip′rō-kā-tō-ri), a. [< reciprocate + -ory.] Going backward and forward; alternating in direction or in action; reciprocating: opposed to rotatory.

Impart a reciprocatory motion to the carriage.
C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 457.

A rotatory movement could be combined with the reciprocatory one. Dredge's Electric Illumination, I. 388.

reciprocity (res-i-pros′i-ti), n. [< F. réciprocité = Sp. reciprocidad = Pg. reciprocidade = It. reciprocità, < ML. reciprocita(t-)s*, < L. reciprocus, reciprocal: see reciprocal.] 1. Reciprocal action or relation; free interchange; mutual responsiveness in act or effect: as, reciprocity of benefits or of feeling; reciprocity of influence.

By the Convention of 1815 a reciprocity of intercourse was established between us and Great Britain.
D. Webster, Speech, Jan. 24, 1832.

2. Equality of commercial privileges between the subjects of different governments in each other's ports, with respect to shipping or merchandise, to the extent established by treaty.

On the Continent, after the fourteenth century, a system of reciprocity was frequently established between the several towns, as for instance in 1365 at Tournay.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. cxxix.

The reciprocity stipulations in our previous treaties were thought to operate disadvantageously to American navigation in the case of the Hanse towns, especially in regard to tobacco. E. Schuyler, Amer. Diplomacy, p. 432.

Another illustration may be found in the history of reciprocity with Canada.
G. F. Edmunds, Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 428.

3. In the Kantian philos., mutual action and reaction in the strict mechanical sense.

Reciprocity, which, as a pure conception, is but the relation of parts or species in a generic whole, becomes . . . invariable coexistence, or coexistence according to a universal rule. E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 412.

Glance once again at reciprocity and causality. The one is a necessary to and fro; the other only a necessary fro.
J. H. Stirling, Mind, X. 65.

4. In geom., the mutual relationship between points and straight lines in a plane, or points and planes in space, etc.; duality.—Hermite's law of reciprocity [named from the French mathematician Charles Hermite, born 1822], the proposition that the number of invariants of the *n*th order in the coefficients possessed by a binary quantic of the *p*th degree is equal to the number of invariants of the order p in the coefficients possessed by a quantic of the *n*th degree.—Law of reciprocity of prime numbers. See law[1].—Plane birational reciprocity, a one to one correspondence between the elements of a field of points and those of a field of rays.—Quadratic reciprocity. See quadratic.—Reciprocity treaty, a treaty granting equal privileges of commercial intercourse in certain specified particulars to the people of the countries concerned. The reciprocity treaty between Great Britain and the United States, existing from 1854 to 1866, provided for freedom of trade in certain commodities, chiefly raw or half-manufactured products, between the latter country and the Canadian provinces. It was abrogated on previous notice given under its terms by the United States. The United States government formed a similar treaty with that of Hawaii in 1876.
=Syn. 1. Exchange, interchange, reciprocation.

reciprock†, a. [Also reciproque; < OF. reciproque, F. réciproque = Pr. reciproc = Sp. recíproco = Pg. It. reciproco, < L. reciprocus, reciprocal: see reciprocous and reciprocal.] Reciprocal.

'Twixt whom and them there is this reciprock commerce.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

reciprocornous (rē-sip-rō-kôr′nus), a. [< L. reciprocicornis, having horns curved backward, < reciprocus, turning back the same way (see reciprocal), + cornu, a horn: see corn[2] and horn.] Having horns turned backward and then forward, as a ram. This form is characteristic of the sheep tribe, though not peculiar to it. See arietiform, and cuts under bighorn, argali, aoudad, and Ovis.

reciprocous† (rē-sip′rō-kus), a. [< L. reciprocus, turning back the same way: see reciprocal.] Reciprocal.

For the removing of which imparity, the cardinal acquainted Taylor "That he had devised to make the band reciprocous and egal."
Strype, Memorials, Hen. VIII., I. i. 5.

reciproquet, a. See reciprock.

recision (rē-sizh′on), n. [< OF. recision, F. récision = Sp. recisión = Pg. recisão = It. recisione, < L. recisio(n-), a cutting off, retrenchment, diminution, < recidere, pp. recisus, cut off, < re-, back, again, + cædere, cut.] 1. The act of cutting off. Cotgrave.—2. Specifically, in surg., same as resection.

recital (rē-sī′tal), n. [< recite + -al.] 1. The reciting or repeating of something previously prepared; especially, an elocutionary recitation; the rhetorical delivery before an audience of a composition committed to memory: as, the recital of a poem; a dramatic recital.—2. A telling over; a narration; a relation of particulars about anything, either orally or in writing: as, the recital of evidence.

Some men . . . give us in recitals of disease
A doctor's trouble, but without the fees.
Cowper, Conversation, l. 313.

He poured out a recital of the whole misadventure.
Howells, Undiscovered Country, p. 154.

3. That which is recited; a story; a narrative: as, a harrowing recital.—4. In law: (a) That part of a deed which rehearses the circumstances inducing or leading to its execution. (b) Any incidental statement of fact in a deed or contract: as, a recital is evidence of the fact recited, as against the party making it.—5. A musical performance or concert, vocal or instrumental, especially one given by a single performer, or a concert consisting of selections from the works of some one composer: as, a Wagner recital; a piano recital.=Syn. 2 and 3. Relation, Narrative, etc. (see account), repetition, speech, discourse.

recitation (res-i-tā′shon), n. [< OF. recitation, F. récitation = Sp. recitación = Pg. recitação = It. recitazione, < L. recitatio(n-), a reading aloud of judicial decrees or literary works, < recitare, pp. recitatus, read aloud, recite: see recite.] 1. The act of reciting or repeating what has been committed to memory; the oral delivery of a composition without the text, especially as a public exercise or performance.—2. The rehearsal by a pupil or student of a lesson or exercise to a teacher or other person; a meeting of a class for the purpose of being orally examined in a lesson.—3. In music: (a) Same as recitative. (b) Same as reciting-note.—Mystic recitation. See mystic.

recitationist (res-i-tā′shon-ist), n. [< recitation + -ist.] One who practises recitation; a public reciter of his own or others' compositions.

The youth who has heard this last of the recitationists deliver one of his poems will recall in future years the fire and spirit of a veteran whose heart was in his work.
Stedman, Poets of America, viii. § 3.

recitation-room (res-i-tā′shon-röm), n. A room for college or school recitations.

recitative (res′i-ta-tēv′), a. and n. [< F. récitatif, n., < It. recitativo, n., a recitative in music; as recite + -ative.] I. a. In music, in the style of a recitative; as if spoken.

II. n. In music: (a) A form or style of song resembling declamation—that is, in which regularity of rhythmic, melodic, and harmonic structure is reduced to the minimum. It is a union of song and speech, with the emphasis sometimes on one element and sometimes on the other, but with a careful avoidance of technical "form" in the musical sense. The division into phrases is properly governed by rhetorical reasons only. The strictly tonal and metrical qualities of a balanced melody are usually but meagerly represented. The sequence of harmonies and of tonalities is often entirely unrestricted. An unaccompanied recitative (recitativo secco) has only a few detached instrumental chords, or a basso continuo, to suggest or sketch the harmonic basis of the melody. Accompaniments of this sort have been given at different periods to different instruments, such as the harpsichord, the violoncello, or the string orchestra alone. An accompanied recitative (recitativo stromentato) has a continuous instrumental background, which occasionally becomes highly descriptive or dramatic, and may be assigned to a full orchestra. This variety of recitative passes over insensibly into the arioso and the aria parlante. The recitative was invented, in the latter part of the sixteenth century, in the course of an attempt by certain Florentine musicians to recover the dramatic declamation of the ancient Greeks. Its recognition as a legitimate style of composition opened the way for the development of the dramatic forms of the opera and the oratorio, in both of which it has always retained a prominent place. Its value in such extended forms is due to its adaptability to descriptive, explanatory, and epic matter generally, as well as to strictly dramatic utterance of every kind. It has been customary to introduce lyric arias by recitatives; but in the operatic works of the present century the formal distinction between recitative and aria has been more or less abandoned as arbitrary. The melos of Wagner is an intermediate form, capable of extension in either direction. Also recitation.

What they call Recitative in Musick is only a more tuneable Speaking; it is a kind of Prose in Musick.
Congreve, Semele, Arg.

Ballads, in the seventeenth century, had become the delight of the whole Spanish people. . . . The blind beggar gathered alms by chanting them, and the puppet-showman gave them in recitative to explain his exhibition.
Ticknor, Span. Lit., III. 77.

(b) A section, passage, or movement in the style described above.

recitatively (res′i-ta-tēv′li), adv. In the manner of recitative.

recitativo (rā-chē-tä-tē′vō), n. [It., a recitative in music: see recitative.] Recitative.

She tripp'd and laugh'd, too pretty much to stand; . . .
Then thus in quaint recitativo spoke.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 52.

recite (rē-sīt′), v.; pret. and pp. recited, ppr. reciting. [< OF. reciter, F. réciter = Pr. Sp. Pg. recitar = It. recitare, < L. recitare, read aloud, recite, repeat from memory, < re-, again, + citare, cite: see cite[1].] I. trans. 1. To repeat or say over, as something previously prepared or committed to memory; rehearse the words of; deliver orally: as, to recite the Litany; to recite a poem.

All the parties concerned were then called together; and the fedtah, or prayer of peace, used in long and dangerous journies, was solemnly recited and assented to by them all.
Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 504.

2. In music, to deliver in recitative.

The dialogue [in the first operas] was neither sung in measure, nor declaimed without Music, but recited in simple musical tones. Burney, Hist. Music, IV. 18.

3. To relate the facts or particulars of; give an account or statement of; tell: as, to recite one's adventures or one's wrongs.

Till that, as comes by course, I doe recite
What fortune to the Briton Prince did lite, Pursuing that proud Knight.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. vi. 17.

Lest the world should task you to recite
What merit lived in me. Shak., Sonnets, lxxii.

"I make," cries Charley, reciting the shield, "three merions on a field or, with an earl's coronet."
Thackeray, Virginians, xxxii.

4. To repeat or tell over in writing; set down the words or particulars of; rehearse; cite; quote.

Which booke (de Ratione Studii et de Liberis Educandis) is oft recited, and moch praysed, in the fragmentes of Nonius, even for authoritie sake.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, ii.

Lucianus, the merry Greeke, reciteth a great number of them [prophecies], deuised by a coosening companion, one Alexander. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 218.

The thoughts of gods let Granville's verse recite.
Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 425.

To recite one's beads. See to bid beads, under bead.
=Syn. 3. Cite, Adduce, etc. (see quote); Rehearse, Reiterate, etc. (see recapitulate); enumerate, detail.

II. intrans. To make a recitation or rehearsal; rehearse or say over what has been learned: as, to recite in public or in a class.

They recite without book.
E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, II. 126.

recite† (rē-sīt′), n. [< recite, v.] Recital.

All former recites or observations of long-liv'd races.
Sir W. Temple, Health.

reciter (rē-sī'tėr), n. [< OF. reciteur, recitateur, F. récitateur = It. recitatore, < L. recitator, a reciter, < recitare, recite: see recite.] One who recites or rehearses; a narrator or declaimer, especially of what has been previously written or told.

Narrative songs were committed to memory, and delivered down from one reciter to another.
Bp. Percy, On Anc. Metrical Romances, § 1. (Latham.)

reciting-note (rē-sī'ting-nōt), n. In chanting, a note or tone on which several or many syllables are recited in monotone. In Gregorian music this tone is regularly the dominant of the mode, but in Anglican chants it may be any tone. Usually every chant contains two, or a double chant four, reciting-notes.

reck (rek), v.; pret. and pp. recked (formerly raught). [Formerly also reak, sometimes misspelled wreak; < ME. recken, rekken, assibilated recchen, later forms, with shortened vowel, of reken, assibilated rechen (pret. roughte, rouhte, rogte, roghte, rohte), < AS. rēcan, rēccan (pret. rōhte), care, reck, = OS. rōkian = MLG. rōken, rūken, LG. roken, ruken, rochen = OHG. ruohhjan, ruochan, ruochen, MHG. ruochen (also, in comp., OHG. geruochan, MHG. geruochen, G. geruhen) = Icel. rækja, reck, regard, etc. (cf. Dan. rögte, care, tend, etc.); cf. AS. rōc* (not recorded) = OHG. ruoh, ruah, MHG. ruoch, care, heed; perhaps akin to Gr. ἀλέγειν (for ἀρέγειν*), have care, heed, reck.] I. intrans. 1. To take heed; have a care; mind; heed; care: usually in a negative clause, often followed by of.

And whether thei had good ansuere or euell, thei raught neuer. Book of the Knight of La Tour Landry, p. 2.

Sith that he myghte do her no companye,
He ne roghte not a myte for to dye.
Chaucer, Complaint of Mars, l. 126.

He recketh not, be so he wynne,
Of that another man shall lese.
Gower, Conf. Amant., ii.

I reck not though I end my life to-day.
Shak., T. and C., v. 6. 26.

Of God, or hell, or worse,
He reck'd not. Milton, P. L., ii. 50.

Light recking of his cause, but battling for their own.
Scott, Vision of Don Roderick, The Vision, st. 45.

2†. To think.

Forthe ther ys oon, y reke,
That can well Frensche speke.

Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 39.

recluse (rē-klös′), a. and n. [1. < ME. recluse, n., < OF. reclus, F. reclus, fem. recluse = Pr. reclus = Sp. Pg. recluso = It. richiuso, < LL. recusus, shut up (ML. reclusus, m., reclusa, f., a recluse), pp. of recludere, shut up, L. unclose, open, etc.: see recludе. 2. < ME. recluse, < OF. recluse, a convent, monastery, < LL. reclusa, fem. of reclusus, shut up: see above.] I. a. Shut up or apart from the world; retired from public notice; sequestered; solitary; existing or passed in a solitary state: as, a recluse monk or hermit; a recluse life.

Here, as recluse as the Turkish Spy at Paris, I am almost unknown to every body.
Goldsmith, To Rev. Thomas Contarine.

II. n. 1. A person who withdraws from the world to spend his days in seclusion and meditation; specifically, a member of a religious community who is voluntarily immured for life in a single cell. The life of a monastic recluse was a privilege accorded only to those of exceptional virtue, and only by express permission of the abbot, chapter, and bishop. In earlier monasticism, the recluse was immured in a cell, sometimes underground, and usually within the precincts of the monastery. He was to have no other apparel than that which he wore at the time of his incarceration. The doorway to the cell was walled up, and only a sufficient aperture was left for the conveyance of provisions, but so contrived as not to allow the recluse to see or be seen. Later monasticism greatly modified this rigor.

2†. A place of seclusion; a retired or quiet situation; a hermitage, convent, or the like.

It is certain that the church of Christ is the pillar of truth, or sacred recluse and peculiar asylum of Religion.
J. Wise, The Churches' Quarrel Espoused.

recluse† (rē-klöz′), v. t. [< ME. reclusen; < recluse, a.] To shut up; seclude; withdraw from intercourse.

Religious out-ryders reclused in here cloistres.
Piers Plowman (C), v. 116.

I had a shrewd Disease hung lately upon me, proceeding, as the Physicians told me, from this long reclused Life.
Howell, Letters, ii. 29.

reclusely (rē-klös′li), adv. In a recluse manner; in retirement or seclusion from society; as a recluse. Lee, Eccles. Gloss.

recluseness (rē-klös′nes), n. The state of being recluse; retirement; seclusion from society.

A kind of calm recluseness is like rest to the overlabour'd man. Feltham, On Eccles. ii. 11. (Resolves, p. 349.)

reclusion (rē-klö′zhọn), n. [< F. reclusion = Sp. reclusión = Pg. reclusão = It. reclusione, < ML. reclusio(n-), < LL. recludere, pp. reclusus, shut up: see reclude and recluse.] 1. A state of retirement from the world; seclusion. Johnson. —2. Specifically, the life or condition of a recluse or immured solitary.

reclusive (rē-klö′siv), a. [< recluse + -ive.] Affording retirement from society; recluse.

And if it sort not well, you may conceal her . . .
In some reclusive and religious life.
Shak., Much Ado, iv. 1. 244.

reclusory (rē-klö′sọ-ri), n.; pl. reclusories (-riz). [= Sp. It. reclusorio, < ML. reclusorium, < LL. recludere, pp. reclusus, shut up, close: see recluse.] The abode or cell of a recluse.

recoct† (rē-kokt′), v. t. [< L. recoctus, pp. of recoquere, cook again, < re-, again, + coquere, cook: see cook[1], v.] To cook over again; hence, to vamp up or renew.

Old women and men, too, . . . seek, as it were, by Medea's charms, to recoct their corps, as she did Æson's, from feeble deformities to sprightly handsomeness.
Jer. Taylor (?), Artif. Handsomeness, p. 71.

recoction (rē-kok′shọn), n. [< recoct + -ion.] A second coction or preparation. Imp. Dict.

recognisable, recognise, etc. See recognizable, etc.

recognition[1] (rek-ọg-nish′ọn), n. [< OF. recognition, F. récognition = It. ricognizione, recognizione, < L. recognitio(n-), < recognoscere, pp. recognitus, recognize, know again: see recognize[1].] 1. The act of recognizing; a knowing again; consciousness that a given object is identical with an object previously cognized.

Every species of fancy hath three modes: recognition of a thing as present, memory of it as past, and foresight of it as to come. N. Grew.

Sense represents phenomena empirically in perception, imagination in association, apperception in the empirical consciousness of the identity of these reproductive representations with the phenomena by which they were given therefore in recognition.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Müller, p. 115.

A person's recognition of a colour is in part an act of inference. J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 67.

2. A formal avowal of knowledge and approval or sanction; acknowledgment: as, the recognition of one government by another as an independent sovereignty or as a belligerent.

The lives of such saints had, at the time of their yearly memorials, solemn recognition in the church of God.
Hooker.

This Byzantine synod assumed the rank and powers of the seventh general council; yet even this title was a recognition of the six preceding assemblies.
Gibbon, Decline and Fall, xlix.

On the 4th he was received in procession at Westminster, seized the crown and sceptre of the Confessor, and was proclaimed king by the name of Edward IV. . . . From the 4th of March the legal recognition of Edward's royal character begins, and the years of his reign date.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 355.

That a man's right to the produce of his brain is equally valid with his right to the produce of his hands is a fact which has yet obtained but a very imperfect recognition.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 155.

3. Cognizance; notice taken; acceptance.

The interesting fact about Apollonius is the extensive recognition which he obtained, and the ease with which his pretensions found acceptance in the existing condition of the popular mind. Froude, Sketches, p. 103.

4. In Scots law, the recovery of lands by the proprietor when they fall to him by the fault of the vassal; or, generally, any return of the feu to the superior, by whatever ground of eviction. = Syn. 1. See recognize[1].

recognition[2] (rē″kog-nish′ọn), n. A repeated cognition.

recognitive (rē-kog′ni-tiv), a. [< L. recognitus, pp. of recognoscere, recognize, + -ive. Cf. cognitive.] Recognizing; recognitory.

recognitor† (rē-kog′ni-tọr), n. [< AF. recognitor, < ML. recognitor, < L. recognitus, pp. of recognoscere, recognize: see recognize[1].] In law, one of a jury impaneled on an assize: so called because they acknowledge a disseizin by their verdict. The recognitor was a witness rather than a juror in the modern sense.

The inquests by Recognitors which we hear of from the time of the Conqueror onwards—the sworn men by whose oaths Domesday was drawn up—come much more nearly [than compurgators] to our notion of Jurors, but still they are not the thing itself.
E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 303.

recognitory (rē-kog′ni-tọ-ri), a. [< L. recognitus, pp. of recognoscere, recognize, + -ory[1].] Pertaining to or connected with recognition.

A pun and its recognitory laugh must be co-instantaneous. Lamb, Distant Correspondents.

recognizability (rek-ọg-nī-za-bil′i-ti), n. [< recognizable + -ity (see -bility).] The state of being recognizable; capacity for being recognized.

recognizable (rek′ọg-nī-za-bl or rē-kog′ni-za-bl), a. [< recognize[1] + -able. Cf. OF. reconnoissable, F. reconnaissable.] Capable of being recognized, known, or acknowledged. Also spelled recognisable.

recognizably (rek′ọg-nī-za-bli or rē-kog′ni-za-bli), adv. So as to be recognized.

recognizance (rē-kog′ni-zans or rē-kon′i-zans), n. [< ME. recognisance, reconyssaunce, < OF. recognoissance, reconnoisance, reconoisance, recunuissance, reconisance, etc., F. reconnaissance (> E. reconnaissance) = Pr. reconaissensa, regonoyssensa = Pg. reconhecença = It. riconoscenza, < ML. recognoscentia, a recognizing, acknowledgment, an obligation binding one over to do some particular act, < L. recognoscen(t-)s, ppr. of recognoscere, recognize: see recognize[1]. Cf. cognizance.] 1. The act of recognizing; acknowledgment of a person or thing; avowal; recognition.

The great bell that heaves
With solemn sound—and thousand others more,
That distance of recognizance bereaves,
Make pleasing music and not wild uproar.
Keats, Sonnet, "How many Bards."

2. Mark or badge of recognition; token.

She did gratify his amorous works
With that recognizance and pledge of love
Which I first gave her [a handkerchief].
Shak., Othello, v. 2. 214.

3. In law: (a) An obligation of record entered into before some court of record or magistrate duly authorized, conditioned to do some particular act, as to appear at court, to keep the peace, or pay a debt.

He was bounden in a reconyssaunce
To paye twenty thousand sheeld anon.
Chaucer, Shipman's Tale, l. 330.

This fellow might be in 's time a great buyer of land, with his statutes, his recognizances, his fines, his double vouchers, his recoveries. Shak., Hamlet, v. 1. 113.

(b†) The verdict of a jury impaneled upon assize.—To enter into recognizances. See enter[1].

recognizant (rē-kog′ni-zant or rē-kon′i-zant), a. [< OF. recognoissant, ppr. of recognoistre, etc., recognize: see recognize[1].] Recognizing; perceiving.

The laird did his best to help him; but he seemed nowise recognizant.
George MacDonald, Warlock o' Glenwarlock, xv.

recognization (rē-kog-ni-zā′shọn), n. [< recognize[1] + -ation.] The act of recognizing.

recognize[1] (rek′ọg-nīz), v.; pret. and pp. recognized, ppr. recognizing. [With accom. term. -ize (as if from recognizance), after OF. recognoistre, F. reconnaître (> E. reconnoiter) = Pr. recognoscer, reconoscer = Sp. reconocer = Pg. reconhecer = It. riconoscere, < L. recognoscere, know again, recall to mind, recognize, examine, certify, < re-, again, + cognoscere, know: see cognition. Cf. cognize.] I. trans. 1. To know (the object) again; recall or recover the knowledge of; perceive the identity of with something formerly known or in the mind.

Then first he recognis'd the æthereal guest;
Wonder and joy alternate fire his breast.
Fenton, in Pope's Odyssey, i. 415.

To recognise an object is to identify it with some object previously seen. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 226.

2. To avow or admit a knowledge of, with approval or sanction; acknowledge or accept formally: as, to recognize one as ambassador; to recognize a government as an independent sovereignty or as a belligerent.

He brought several of them . . . to recognize their sense of their undue procedure used by them unto him.
Bp. Fell, Life of Hammond. (Latham.)

Only that State can live in which injury to the least member is recognized as damage to the whole.
Emerson, Address, Soldiers' Monument, Concord.

Holland, immediately after the surrender of Yorktown, had recognised the independence of America, which had as yet only been recognised by France.
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xv.

3. To indicate one's acquaintance with (a person) by a salute: as, to pass one without recognizing him.—4. To indicate appreciation of: as, to recognize merit.—5. To review; reëxamine; take cognizance of anew.

However their causes speed in your tribunals, Christ will recognize them at a greater. South.

6. To acknowledge; admit or confess as an obligation or duty.

It is more to the purpose to urge that those who have so powerful an engine [as the press] in their hands should recognize their responsibility in the use of it.
H. N. Oxenham, Short Studies, p. 87.

= Syn. 2-4. Recognize, Acknowledge. The essential difference between these words lies in the difference between letting in to one's own knowledge (recognize) and letting out to other people's knowledge (acknowledge). Hence the opposite of recognize is disown or some kindred word; that of acknowledge is conceal or deny. To recognize an obligation and to acknowledge an obligation differ precisely in this way. The preacher may be able to make a man recognize, even if he cannot make him acknowledge, his need of moral improvement. See acknowledge.

II. intrans. In law, to enter an obligation of record before a proper tribunal: as, A. B. recognized in the sum of twenty dollars.

Also spelled recognise.

recognize[2] (rē-kog′nīz), v. t. To cognize again.

By the aid of Reasoning we are guided in our search, and by it re-cognize known relations under somewhat different attendant circumstances.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 172.

recognizee (rē-kog-ni-zē′ or rē-kon-i-zē′), n. [< recognize[1] + -ee[1].] In law, the person to whom a recognizance is made.

The recognizance is an acknowledgment of a former debt upon record, the form whereof is "that A. B. doth acknowledge to owe to our lord the king, to the plaintiff, to C. D., or the like, the sum of ten pounds" . . . : in which case the king, the plaintiff, C. D., &c., is called the recognizee, "is cui cognoscitur"; as he that enters into the recognizance is called the cognizor, "is qui cognoscit."
Blackstone, Com., II. xx.

recognizer (rek′og-nī-zėr), n. [< recognize[1] + -er[1]. Cf. recognizor.] One who recognizes.

recognizingly (rek′og-nī-zing li), adv. With recognition; consciously; appreciatively.

I know not if among all his "friends" he [John Wilson] has left one who feels more recognizingly what he was . . . than I. Carlyle, in Froude, Life in London, xxii.

recognizor (rē-kog′ni-zor or rē-kon′i-zor), n. [< OF. recognoisseur*, F. reconnaisseur; as recognize[1] + -or[1].] In law, one who enters into a recognizance.

recognoscet†, v. t. [< L. recognoscere, recognize: see recognize[1].] Same as recognize[1]. Boyle.

The Examiner [Boyle] might have remembered . . . who it was that distinguished his style with "ignore" and "recognosce," and other words of that sort, which nobody has yet thought fit to follow him in.
Bentley (quoted in F. Hall's Mod. Eng., p. 118).

recoil[1] (rē-koil′), v. [Early mod. E. also recoyle, recule; < ME. recoilen, reculen, < OF. reculer, F. reculer, draw back, go back, recoil, retire, defer, drive off (= Pr. Gael. cūl, the back, hinder part, = W. cil, back, a retreat.] I. intrans. 1. To draw back; go back; retreat; take a sudden backward motion after an advance.

Sodainely he blewe the retraite, and reculed almoste a myle backewarde. Hall, Hen. V., an. 6.

We were with vyolence and rage of the sayde tempest constreyned to recoyle and turne backwardes, and to seke some hauyn vpon the coste of Turkey.
Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 59.

Ye both forwearied be; therefore a whyle
I read you rest, and to your bowres recoyle.
Spenser, F. Q., I. x. 17.

Looking on the lines
Of my boy's face, methoughts I did recoil
Twenty-three years, and saw myself unbreech'd.
Shak., W. T., i. 2. 154.

Their manner is, when any will inuade them, to allure and drawe them on by flying and reculing (as if they were afraide). Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 489.

His men were compelled to recoil from the dense array of German pikes. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 12.

2. To start or draw back, as from anything repulsive, distressing, alarming, or the like; shrink.

First Fear his hand, its skill to try,
Amid the chords bewildered laid,
And back recoiled, he knew not why,
E'en at the sound himself had made.
Collins, The Passions.

The heart
Recoils from its own choice.
Cowper, Task, i. 467.

3. To fall, rush, start, bound, or roll back, as in consequence of resistance which cannot be overcome by the force impressed; return after a certain strain or impetus: literally or figuratively.

These dread curses, like the sun 'gainst glass,
Or like an overcharged gun, recoil.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 2. 331.

Revenge, at first though sweet,
Bitter ere long, back on itself recoils.
Milton, P. L., ix. 172.

4†. To fall off; degenerate.

Be revenged;
Or she that bore you was no queen, and you
Recoil from your great stock.
Shak., Cymbeline, i. 6. 128.

II.† trans. To drive back.

Mariners and merchants with much toyle
Labour'd in vaine to have secur'd their prize, . . .
But neither toyle nor traveill might her backe recoyle.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 19.

recoil[1] (rē-koil′), n. [Early mod. E. also recule; < OF. recul, recoil, backward movement, retreat, F. recul, recoil, rebound, = Pg. recuo, a recoil; from the verb.] 1†. A drawing back; retreat.

The infernal doors. Milton, P. L., ii. 880.

The recoil from formalism is scepticism.
F. W. Robertson.

Who knows it not — this dead recoil
Of weary fibres stretched with toil?
O. W. Holmes, Midsummer.

3. Specifically, the backward movement of a firearm or a piece of ordnance when discharged.

Like an unskilful gunner, he usually misses his aim, and is hurt by the recoil of his own piece.
Sheridan, The Duenna, i. 3.

Energy of recoil. See energy. — Recoil-check. See check[1].

recoil[2] (rē-koil′), v. t. [< re- + coil[1].] To coil again.

He [the driller] then reverses the motion, uncoils it [the cable], and recoils it up the other way.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LV. 116.

recoiler (rē-koi′lėr), n. One who recoils or falls back. Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, p. 98.

recoil-escapement (rē-koil′es-kāp″ment), n. In horol., an escapement in which after each beat the escape-wheel recoils, or moves backward slightly: opposed to a dead-beat escapement, in which the escape-wheel rests dead, or without motion in the interval between the beats.

recoilment (rē-koil′ment), n. [Formerly also recuilment; < OF. (and F.) reculement, < reculer, recoil: see recoil[1].] The act of recoiling.

The sharp pains of the stone were allay'd by that heaviness of sense which the recuilment of serous moisture into the habit of the body and insertions of the nerves occasion'd. Hammond, in Bp. Fell.

recoil-pallet (rē-koil′pal″et), n. One of the pallets which form an essential part of the mechanism of a recoil-escapement.

A fleet of above thirty vessels, all carrying cannon, was in about three months little less than created, though a few of the largest were reconstructions, having been first framed and sent over from Great Britain.
Belsham, Hist. Great Britain, an. 1777.

Reconstruction Acts, two acts of Congress, of which the first, entitled "an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," was passed over the President's veto on March 2d, 1867; and the second, a supplementary act, was passed later in the same month. These acts embodied the congressional plan of reconstruction, providing that every State should remain under military government until certain acts should be performed. The principal conditions were that each State should hold a convention and frame a constitution; that this constitution must be ratified by popular vote and approved by Congress; that the new State legislature must ratify the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution; and that when the requisite number of States had ratified this amendment, any State which had fulfilled all requirements should be readmitted to the Union, and entitled to congressional representation. By 1870 all the seceding States were readmitted, but they were not all represented in Congress until 1871.

In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood
Of flutes and soft recorders. Milton, P. L., i. 551.

5. A registering apparatus; specifically, in teleg., a receiving instrument in which a permanent record of the signals is made. In the earlier form, as invented by Morse, the record was made by embossing on a ribbon of paper by means of a style fixed to one end of a lever, which carried at the other end the armature of an electromagnet. Several devices for using ink were afterward substituted for the style. In Bain's chemical recorder the dots and dashes were registered by the chemical decomposition of some substance with which the paper was impregnated, the decomposition being produced on the passage of a current of electricity. In Thomson's siphon recorder, used principally on long cable-lines, a fine glass tube bent into the shape of a siphon is attached to the movable part of the receiving instrument, one arm of which dips into a vessel of ink, and the other moves back and forth at right angles to a strip of paper which is regularly moved by clockwork. The electrification of the ink causes it to be projected from the end of the tube in minute drops, so that the movements of the coil are recorded on the slip of paper in very fine dots very near one another. The principal advantage of this instrument is that only a very feeble current is required to give a permanent record of the signals.

Another Vision happned to the same Authoure, as comfortable recreatyve as the former was dolorous.
Puttenham, Partheniades.

Let not your recreations be lavish spenders of your time; but choose such which are healthful, short, transient, recreative. Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, i. 1.

In this "Manual of Sins" . . . our recreative monk has introduced short tales, some grave and some he deemed facetious, which convey an idea of domestic life and domestic language. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I. 138.

recreatively (rek'rē-ā-tiv-li), adv. In a recreative manner; with recreation or diversion. Imp. Dict.

recreativeness (rek'rē-ā-tiv-nes), n. The quality of being recreative, refreshing, or diverting.

recrement (rek'rē-ment), n. [< OF. recrement, F. récrément = Sp. Pg. recremento, refuse, < L. recrementum, dross, slag, < recernere*, < re-, back, + cernere, pp. cretus, separate: see concern, concrete, and cf. excrement[1].] 1. Superfluous matter separated from that which is useful; dross; scoria; spume.

Of all the visible creatures that God hath made, none is so pure and simple as light; it discovers all the foulness of the most earthly recrements, it mixeth with none of them. Bp. Hall, Remains, p. 41.

2. In med., a fluid which, after having been separated from the blood, is returned to it, as the saliva, the secretion of serous membranes, etc.

recremental (rek-rē-men'tąl), a. [< recrement + -al.] Consisting of or pertaining to recrement; recrementitious. Armstrong, Art of Preserving Health, iii. 254.

recrementitial (rek'rē-men-tish'al), a. [< F. récrémentitiel; as recrement + -it-ial.] Same as recrementitious.

recrementitious (rek'rē-men-tish'us), a. [= Sp. Pg. recrementicio; as recrement + -it-ious.] Drossy; consisting of superfluous matter separated from that which is valuable. Boyle, Works, I. 645.

recrew† (rē-krö'), v. t. [< recrew*, < OF. recreue, recrue, a supply, spare stores, recruit, F. recrue, supply, addition, recruit, levy: see recruit.] To recruit.

One intire troop with some other odd troopers, and some stragling foot, that were to recrew other companies.
Prince Rupert's beating up of the Rebel Quarters at Post-[comb and Chinner (1643), p. xvi. (Davies.) recriminate (rē-krim'i-nāt), v. [< ML. recriminatus, pp. of recriminare (> It. recriminare = Sp. Pg. recriminar = OF. recriminer, F. récriminer), accuse in return, < L. re-, back, + criminari, accuse: see criminate.] I. intrans. To return one accusation with another; retort a charge; charge an accuser with a like crime.

Such are some of the personalities with which Decker recriminated. I. D'Israeli, Calamities of Authors, II. 339.

II. trans. To accuse in return. [Rare.]

Did not Joseph lie under black infamy? he scorned so much as to clear himself, or to recriminate the strumpet.
South.

recrimination (rē-krim-i-nā'shọn), n. [< OF. recrimination, F. récrimination = Sp. recriminación = Pg. recriminação = It. recriminazione, < ML. recriminatio(n-), < recriminare, recriminate: see recriminate.] 1. The act of recriminating; the meeting of an accusation by a counter-accusation: as, to indulge in mutual recriminations.

Let us endeavour to remove this objection, not by recrimination (which is too easie in such cases), but by living suitably to our holy Religion.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. vi.

Short-sighted and injudicious, however, as the conduct of England may be in this system of aspersion, recrimination on our part would be equally ill-judged.
Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 76.

2. In law, an accusation, brought by an accused person against the accuser, of being in a similar guilt as charged, or derelict in a corresponding duty; a counter-accusation.

recriminative (rē-krim′i-nā-tiv), a. [< recriminate + -ive.] Of the nature of or pertaining to recrimination; indulging in recrimination; recriminatory. Imp. Dict.

recriminator (rē-krim′i-nā-tọr), n. [Cf. F. récriminateur = Sp. recriminador, one who recriminates, recriminating; as recriminate + -or[1].] One who recriminates; one who accuses the accuser of a like crime.

recriminatory (rē-krim′i-nā-tọ-ri), a. [= F. récriminatoire = Pg. recriminatorio; as recriminate + -ory.] Retorting accusation; recriminating.

> They seem to have been so entirely occupied with the defence of the French directory, so very eager in finding recriminatory precedents to justify every act of its intolerable insolence. Burke, A Regicide Peace, iii.

recrossed (rē-krôst′), a. In her.: (a) Having the ends crossed. (b) Same as crossed when noting a crosslet: thus, a cross crosslet recrossed is the same as a cross crosslet crossed.

recrucify (rē-krö′si-fī), v. t. [< re- + crucify.] To crucify again.

> By it [wilful sin] we do, as the Apostle teaches, recrucify the Son of God, and again expose Him to open shame. Barrow, Works, VI. 79.

recrudency (rē-krö′den-si), n. [As recrud(esce) + -ency.] Same as recrudescence.

recrudesce (rē-krọ̈-des′), v. i.; pret. and pp. recrudesced, ppr. recrudescing. [= Pg. recrudescer, < L. recrudescere, become raw again, < re-, back, again, + crudescere, grow harsh, < crudus, raw: see crude.] 1. To become raw or exacerbated again.—2. To revive; become alive again; be renewed.

> Ideas which have made no part of the waking life are apt to recrudesce in the sleep-waking state. Mind, IX. 118.

★recrudescence (rē-krọ̈-des′ens), n. [< F. recrudescence = Sp. Pg. recrudescencia; as recrudescen(t) + -ce.] 1. The state of being recrudescent, or becoming raw or exacerbated again. Hence—2. A reopening; renewal; a coming into existence anew; a fresh outbreak.

> The king required some regulations should be made for obviating the recrudescence of those ignoramus abuses for the future that had been so scandalous before. Roger North, Examen, p. 632. (Davies.)

> That recrudescence of military organization which followed the Conquest. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 525.

3. In med., increased activity of a disease or morbid process after partial recovery.

> A kind of recrudescence [of scarlet fever], but without the reappearance of the rash, would seem possible up to the eighth week. Quain, Med. Dict., p. 1392.

4. In bot., the production of a fresh shoot from the top of a ripened spike.

recrudescency (rē-krọ̈-des′en-si), n. [As recrudescence (see -cy).] Same as recrudescence. Browning, Ring and Book, I. 578.

recrudescent (rē-krọ̈-des′ent), a. [= Pg. recrudescente, < L. recrudescen(t-)s, ppr. of recrudescere, break out afresh, become raw again, < re-, again, + crudescere, become raw.] 1. Growing raw, sore, or painful again.—2. Coming into existence or renewed vigor again.

recruit (rē-krōt′), v. [Formerly also recrute; = D. recruteren = G. recrutieren = Dan. rekrutere = Sw. rekrytera, < OF. recruter, levy, prop. recluter, mend, = Pg. recrutar, reclutar, levy, = Sp. reclutar, complete, supply, also recruit, = It. reclutare, complete, levy, < ML. reclutare (after Rom.), recruit, orig. mend, patch, < L. re- + Teut. (AS.) clūt (> OF. clut), clout, lit. 'rag,' 'piece': see clout[1]. The orig. sense was forgotten, and confusion ensued with OF. recreue, recrue, a supply, spare stores, etc., recrue, a levy of troops, prop. an addition, supply, fem. of recreu, F. recru, pp. of recroître, recroistre, grow again, < L. re-, again, + crescere, grow, increase: see crease[2], increase, etc. Cf. accrew, recrew, crew[1].] I. trans. 1. To repair by fresh supplies; supply lack or deficiency in.

> Her cheeks glow the brighter, recruiting their colour. Granville, Phyllis Drinking.

2. To restore the wasted vigor of; renew the health, spirits, or strength of; refresh: as, to recruit one's health.

> And so I began the world anew; and, by the blessing of God, was again pretty well recruited before I left this town. R. Knox (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 385).

> I sat down and talked with the family while our guide recruited himself with a large dish of thick sour milk. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 419.

3. To supply with new men; specifically, to supply with new men for any deficiency of troops; make up by enlistment: as, to recruit an army.

> His [Amurath's] forces, . . . though daily recruited by the new supplies which came to them, yet mouldred away. North, tr. of Theuet's Lives.

> The Frank population of Cyprus . . . was either constantly diminishing or recruited by arrivals from the West. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 168.

4. To provision; take supplies on board of, as a vessel: as in the phrase to recruit ship. = Syn. Reinforce, replenish.

II. intrans. 1. To gain new supplies of anything lost or wasted; gain flesh, health, spirits, etc.

> My master, said I, honest Thomas . . . is come to Bath to recruit. Yes, sir, I said to recruit—and whether for men, money, or constitution, you know, sir, is nothing to him, nor any one else. Sheridan, The Rivals, ii. 1.

2. To gain new supplies of men for any object; specifically, to raise new soldiers.

> When a student in Holland he there met Carstairs, on a mission into that country to recruit for persons qualified to fill the chairs in the several universities of Scotland. Sir W. Hamilton.

3. To enter port for supplies, as a vessel.

recruit (rē-krōt′), n. [= D. recruut = G. recrut = Dan. rekrut = Sw. rekryt, < OF. recreute = Sp. recluta = Pg. recruta = It. recluta, recruit; from the verb, confused in OF. with recreue, a supply, recrue, a levy of troops.] 1. A fresh supply of anything wasted or used, as of provisions and supplies on shipboard, etc.

> Carrying also plentiful recruits of provisions. Beverley, Virginia, i. ¶ 9.

> A Recruit of new People. Howell, Letters, I. i. 38.

> The state is to have recruits to its strength, and remedies to its distempers. Burke.

2. A soldier or sailor newly enlisted to supply the deficiency of an army or a navy; one who has newly filled a vacancy in any body or class of persons.

> The powers of Troy
> With fresh recruits their youthful chief sustain. Dryden.

3. A substitute for something wanting. [Rare.]

> Whatever Nature has in worth deny'd,
> She gives in large recruits of needful pride. Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 206.

Port of recruit (naut.), a recruiting-station.

recruital (rē-krō′tal), n. [< recruit + -al.] A renewed supply of anything lost or exhausted, especially of strength or vigor, bodily or mental. [Rare.]

> Shortly after this communion Mr. Chalmers sought relief and recruital in an excursion to Fifeshire. W. Hanna, Chalmers, II. 65.

recruiter (rē-krō′tėr), n. One who recruits.

recruithood (rē-krōt′hụd), n. [< recruit + -hood.] The condition of a recruit; the state or the period of being a recruit. [Rare.]

> Old soldiers who read this will remember their green recruithood and smile assent. The Century, XXIX. 108.

recruiting-ground (rē-krō′ting-ground), n. A place or region where recruits are or may be obtained.

> The murderers of Cæsar had turned the provinces which they governed into one vast recruiting-ground for a last decisive struggle. W. W. Capes, The Early Empire, Int.

recruiting-party (rē-krō′ting-pär″ti), n. A number of soldiers, in charge of an officer or a non-commissioned officer, who are detached from their regiment or post for the purpose of enlisting recruits.

recruiting-sergeant (rē-krō′ting-sär″jent), n. A sergeant deputed to enlist recruits.

recruitment (rē-krōt′ment), n. [< F. recrutement = Sp. reclutamiento = Pg. recrutamento, the act of recruiting; as recruit + -ment.] The act or business of recruiting; the act of raising new supplies of men for an army or a navy.

> The theoretical recruitment is partly voluntary and partly by lot for the militia. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 40.

Rec. Sec. An abbreviation of Recording Secretary.

rect†, a. [ME., < L. rectus, straight, direct, right: see right.] Direct; immediate.

> Thus ys mede and mercede as two manere relacions, Rect and indyrect. Piers Plowman (C), iv. 336.

★rect. An abbreviation of (a) in pharmacy, (rectificatus) rectified; (b) rector.

recta, n. Plural of rectum.

rectal (rek′tal), a. [< rectum + -al.] Pertaining to or connected with the rectum or straight gut: as, rectal parts or organs; rectal disease, operation, instrument; rectal action, evacuation.—Rectal alimentation, the administration of enemeta containing food specially prepared for absorption by the mucous membrane of the large intestine.—Rectal anæsthesia, the administration of ether or other anesthetics by the rectum.—Rectal chemise. See chemise.—Rectal crises, paroxysms of pain in the rectum, often with tenesmus, and sensations as of a foreign body, met with in cases of locomotor ataxia.—Rectal diaphragm, the sheet of muscles closing the rectal outlet of the pelvis, consisting of the sphincter ani externus superficially, and a deeper layer composed of the levator ani and coccygeus.—Rectal fissure, a very painful cracklike opening in the mucous membrane of the lower part of the rectum.—Rectal glands. See gland.

rectalgia (rek-tal′ji-ą), n. [NL., < rectum, rectum, + Gr. ἄλγος, pain.] Neuralgia of the rectum: same as proctalgia.

> If all Athens should decree that . . . in rectangle triangles the square which is made of the side that subtendeth the right angle is equal to the squares which are made of the sides containing the right angle, . . . geometricians . . . would not receive satisfaction without demonstration thereof. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 7.

II. n. 1. A quadrilateral plane figure having all its angles right angles and its opposite sides consequently equal. When the adjacent sides are equal, it is a square. The area of a rectangle is equal to the product of two adjacent sides; thus, if its sides measure 6 feet and 4 feet, its area is 24 square feet.

Rectangle.

2. The product of two lengths. Thus, especially in old books, "the rectangle under two lines" is spoken of, meaning substantially the product of their lengths.

3†. A right angle.

> Th' acute, and the rect-Angles too, > Stride not so wide as obtuse Angles doo. Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Columnes.

rectangled (rek′tang-gld), a. [< rectangle + -ed[2].] 1. Having a right angle or right angles; right-angled.—2. In her., forming a right angle, or broken twice, forming two right angles: said of a heraldic line and also of a division of the field so bounded by it: as, a chief rectangled.—Fesse rectangled. See fesse.

Argent, a Chief Rectangled gules.

★rectangular (rek-tang′gū-lär), a. [= F. rectangulaire = Sp. Pg. rectangular, < L. rectangulus, rectangled: see rectangle.] Right-angled; having an angle or angles of ninety degrees.—Rectangular coördinates, in analytical geom. See coördinate.—Rectangular hyperbola, a hyperbola whose asymptotes are at right angles to one another.—Rectangular map-projection. See projection.—Rectangular solid, in geom., a solid whose axis is perpendicular to its base.

Rectangular Hyperbola.

rectangularity (rek-tang-gū-lar′i-ti), n. [< F. rectangularité; as rectangular + -ity.] The quality or state of being rectangular or right-angled; rectangularness.

rectangularly (rek-tang′gū-lär-li), adv. In a rectangular manner; with or at right angles.—Rectangularly polarized, in optics, oppositely polarized.

rectangularness (rek-tang′gū-lär-nes), n. Rectangularity. Imp. Dict.

recti, n. Plural of rectus.

recticuræus (rek″ti-krọ̈-rē′us), n.; pl. recticuræi (-ī). [NL., < L. rectus, straight, + crus (crur-), leg: see cruræus.] The straight muscle of the front of the thigh; the rectus femoris. Coues.

rectifiable (rek′ti-fī-ą-bl), a. [< F. rectifiable = Sp. rectificable = Pg. rectificavel; as rectify + -able.] 1. Capable of being rectified, corrected, or set right: as, a rectifiable mistake.—2. In geom., said of a curve admitting the construction of a straight line equal in length to any definite part of the curve.

★rectification (rek″ti-fi-kā′shọn), n. [< OF. (and F.) rectification = Pr. rectificatio = Sp. rectificación = Pg. rectificação = It. rettificazione, < ML. rectificatio(n-), < rectificare, rectify: see rectify.] The act or operation of rectifying. (a) The act of correcting, amending, or setting right that which is wrong or erroneous: as, the rectification of errors, mistakes, or abuses.

> The proper rectification of the expression would be to insert the adverb as. H. Blair, Rhetoric, xxii.

(b) The process of refining a substance by repeated or fractional distillation: it is in this way freed from other substances which are either more or less volatile than itself, or from non-volatile matters: as, the rectification of spirits. The concentration of sulphuric acid in platinum or glass vessels is sometimes (improperly) called rectification.

The process of rectification is generally done by redistilling, and filtering through alternate layers of woolen blankets, sand, and granulated bone or maple charcoal.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 80.

(c) In geom., the determination of a straight line whose length is equal to a given portion of a curve; the finding a formula for the length of the arc of a given curve.—Rectification of a globe, in astron. and geog., the adjustment of it preparatory to the solution of a proposed problem.

rectified (rek'ti-fīd), p. a. [Pp. of rectify.] 1. Made right; corrected.

Be just therefore to thyself all the way, pay thyself, and take acquittances of thyself, all the way, which is only done under the seal and in the testimony of a rectified conscience. Donne, Sermons, ix.

2. In hort., developed in a desired direction, as when plain tulips are propagated till they sport into variegated forms.

Some of the progeny "break," that is, produce flowers with the variegation which is so much prized. The flower is then said to be "rectified." Encyc. Brit., XII. 259.

rectifier (rek'ti-fī-ėr), n. [< rectify + -er[1].] One who or that which rectifies. (a) One who corrects or amends.

Fast friend he was to reformation, . . .
Next rectifier of wry law.
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. ii. 432.

(b) One who refines a substance by repeated distillations or by filtering or any other method; specifically, one who rectifies liquors. (c) In the distillation of alcoholic liquors: (1) A vessel or receptacle in which a second distillation is carried on, to condense the liquor and increase its alcoholic strength, or to flavor it by exposing the flavoring substance to the vaporized spirit. (2) A cylindrical vessel continuous with a primary still, in which repeated distillations occur till the alcohol reaches the desired strength. Also called rectifying column, and simply column. (d†) An instrument formerly used for indicating the errors of the compass. Falconer.

rectify (rek'ti-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. rectified, ppr. rectifying. [Early mod. E. rectifie, rectyfye; < OF. (and F.) rectifier = Pr. Sp. Pg. rectificar = It. rettificare, < ML. rectificare, make right, rectify, < L. rectus, straight (= E. right), + -ficare, < facere, make.] 1. To make right or straight; correct when wrong, erroneous, or false; amend: as, to rectify errors, mistakes, or abuses: sometimes applied to persons.

I meant to rectify my conscience.
Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 4. 203.

I onlie strive
To rectifie abuses which deprive
The Gospell of his propagation
And plentifull encrease.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 16.

To rectifie a common-wealth with debaushed people is impossible. Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 106.

When an authentic watch is shown,
Each man winds up and rectifies his own.
Suckling, Aglaura, Epil.

This morning I received from him the following letter, which, after having rectified some little orthographical mistakes, I shall make a present of to the public.
Addison, Husbands and Wives.

Specifically—2. In distilling: (a) To remove impurities from (an alcoholic distillate) and raise to a required proof or strength by repeated distillation. As flavoring materials are often added during rectification in the manufacture of gin, cordials, factitious brandy, etc., the term rectify has been extended to the performance of these processes. Hence—(b) To bring (a spirit) by repeated distillation to the strength required, and at the same time to impart to it the desired flavor. See rectifier. —3. In chemical manuf. and in phar.: (a) To separate impurities from (a crystalline body) by dissolving and recrystallizing it, sometimes repeatedly, and sometimes also with intermediate washing of the crystals. (b) To raise (a liquid) to a prescribed strength by extraction of some part of its liquid components. Distillation under ordinary atmospheric pressure or in a vacuum, and absorption of water by substances having strong affinity for water, as caustic lime, calcium chlorid, etc., when such substances do not affect the chemical constitution of the substances under treatment, are common processes employed in rectification. (c) To remove impurities from (solutions) by filtering them through substances absorbent of dissolved impurities, but non-absorbent of, and chemically inactive upon, the substance to be purified. Of such materials bone-black is a typical example, especially in sugar-refining. (d) To purify by one or more resublimations.—4. In math., to determine the length of (a curve, or a part of a curve) included between two limits.—5. In the use of the globes, to place (a globe) in such a position that the solution of a given problem may be effected with it.—Rectifying developable, or rectifying developable surface of a non-plane curve, a developable surface such that, when it is unrolled into a plane with the curve to which it belongs, the latter is unrolled into a right line: it is perpendicular to the normal and the osculating planes.—Rectifying edge, the cuspidal edge of the rectifying developable.—Rectifying line, the line common to two consecutive rectifying planes.—Rectifying plane, a plane tangent to the rectifying surface.—To rectify alcoholic liquors. See def. 2.—To rectify a sun-dial. See the quotation.

To rectify the dial (using the old expression, which means to prepare the dial for an observation).
Encyc. Brit., VII. 161.

To rectify the course of a vessel, in nav., to determine its true course from indications of the ship's compass, by correcting the errors of the compass due to magnetic variations and local attractions.—To rectify the globe, in astron. and geog., to bring the sun's place in the ecliptic on a globe to the metal meridian, and otherwise adjust it in order to prepare it for the solution of any proposed problem.=Syn. 1. Improve, Better, etc. (see amend), redress, adjust, regulate.

Rectigradæ (rek-tig'rā-dē), n. pl. [NL.: see rectigrade.] A group of spiders; the rectigrade spiders. Also Rectigrada, Rectigrades.

rectigrade (rek'ti-grād), a. [< L. rectus, straight, + gradi, step: see grade[1].] Walking straight forward, as a spider; pertaining to the Rectigradæ: correlated with laterigrade, saltigrade, etc.

rectilineal (rek-ti-lin'ē-al), a. [Cf. It. rettilineo = OF. (and F.) rectiligne; < ML. rectilineus*, having a straight line, < L. rectus, straight, right, + linea, a line: see right and line[2], n.] Same as rectilinear.

rectilineally (rek-ti-lin'ē-al-i), adv. Same as rectilinearly.

rectilinear (rek-ti-lin'ē-ėr), a. [< L. rectilineus, rectilineal (see rectilineal), + -ar[3].] Straight-lined; bounded by straight lines; consisting of a straight line or of straight lines; straight: as, a rectilinear figure or course. Also rectilineal.

Whenever a ray of light is by any obstacle turned out of its rectilinear way, it will never return to the same rectilinear way, unless perhaps by very great accident.
Newton, Opticks.

Rectilinear lens, motion, etc. See the nouns.—Rectilinear muscle. See muscle[1], 2.

rectilinearity (rek-ti-lin-ē-ar'i-ti), n. [< rectilinear + -ity.] The state of being rectilinear. Coleridge.

rectilinearly (rek-ti-lin'ē-ėr-li), adv. In a rectilinear manner or direction; in a right line.

rectilinearness (rek-ti-lin'ē-ėr-nes), n. The quality or condition of being rectilinear. W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 2d ser., p. 230.

rectilineous† (rek-ti-lin'ē-us), a. [= OF. (and F.) rectiligne = Sp. rectilíneo = Pg. rectilineo = It. rettilineo, < ML. rectilineus:* see rectilineal.] Rectilinear. Ray, Works of Creation, i.

rectinerved (rek'ti-nėrvd), a. [< L. rectus, straight, + nervus, nerve, + -ed[2].] In bot., having nerves running straight from their origin to the apex or to the margin: said mostly of parallel-nerved leaves.

rection (rek'shon), n. [< L. rectio(n-), a leading, guiding, government, direction, < regere, pp. rectus, rule, govern: see regent.] In gram., the influence or power of a word in consequence of which another word in the sentence must have a certain form, in regard to number, case, person, mode, or the like; government.

rectipetality (rek'ti-pe-tal'i-ti), n. [< L. rectus, straight, + petere, seek (see petition), + -al + -ity.] In bot., the inherent tendency of stems to grow in a right line, as indicated by Voechting's experiments with the clinostat. Even parts grown crooked incline to straighten when freed from deflecting influences. This general tendency is modified, however, by an irregularity called heterauxesis (which see).

rectirostral (rek-ti-ros'tral), a. [Cf. F. rectirostre; < L. rectus, straight, + rostrum, beak, + -al.] Having a straight bill or beak, as a bird.

rectischiac (rek-tis'ki-ak), a. [< NL. rectum + ischium + -ac.] Same as ischiorectal.

rectiserial (rek-ti-sē'ri-al), a. [< L. rectus, straight, + series, a row: see serial.] 1. Disposed in a right line; rectilinear or straight, as a row or series of parts.—2. In bot., disposed in one or more straight ranks: specifically used by Bravais, in contrast with curviserial (which see), to describe those forms of phyllotaxy in which a second leaf soon stands exactly over any given leaf, and thus all fall into right lines.

rectitic (rek-tit'ik), a. [< rectitis + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with rectitis.

rectitis (rek-tī'tis), n. [NL., < rectum + -itis.] Inflammation of the rectum.

rectitude (rek'ti-tūd), n. [< OF. rectitude, rettitude, F. rectitude = Pr. rectetut = Cat. rectitut = Sp. rectitud = Pg. rectitude = It. rettitudine, < L. rectitudo (-in-), straightness, uprightness, < rectus, straight, = E. right: see right.] 1. Straightness: as, the rectitude of a line. Johnson.

Young pines, bent by . . . snowfalls or other accident, in seeking to recover their rectitude, describe every graceful form of curve or spiral. A. B. Alcott, Tablets, p. 12.

2. Rightness of principle or practice; uprightness of mind; exact conformity to truth, or to the rules prescribed for moral conduct by either divine or human laws; integrity; honesty; justice.

Of the rectitude and sincerity of their life and doctrine to judge rightly, wee must judge by that which was to be their rule. Milton, Reformation in Eng., i.

Provided they "keep o' the windy side of the law," the great majority are but little restrained by regard for strict rectitude. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 465.

3. Correctness; freedom from error, as of conduct.

Perfectly conscious of the rectitude of her own appearance, [she] attributed all this mirth to the oddity of mine. Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 2.

=Syn. 2. Integrity, Uprightness, etc. (see honesty), principle, equity.

recto (rek'tō), n. [1. < L. recto, abl. of rectum, right: see right, n. 2. For recto folio, 'the right page,' opposed to verso folio, 'the opposite page': L. recto, abl. of rectus, right; folio, abl. of folium, a leaf, sheet: see folio.] 1. In law, a writ of right, now abolished.—2. In printing, the right-hand page of an open book: opposed to the left-hand, reverso or verso. In books as commonly printed, the odd folios, pages 1, 3, 5, 7, etc., are the rectos; the even folios, pages 2, 4, 6, 8, etc., the reversos.

Junius had seen books of this kind printed by Coster (the beginnings of his labours) on the rectos of the leaves only, not on both sides. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 689.

recto-. In composition, rectal; of the rectum.

rectocele (rek'tō-sēl), n. [< NL. rectum, rectum, + Gr. κήλη, tumor.] Prolapse of the rectovaginal wall through the vagina. Compare proctocele.

rectogenital (rek-tō-jen'i-tal), a. [< NL. rectum, rectum, + L. genitalis, genital.] Of or pertaining at once to the rectum and to the genitalia: as, the rectogenital chamber.

rector (rek'tor), n. [= OF. retteur, recteur, F. recteur = Pr. Sp. rector = Pg. rector, reitor = It. rettore, < L. rector, a ruler, director, rector, < regere, pp. rectus, rule: see regent.] 1. A ruler or governor. [Rare.]

The rector of the vniuersitie called to counsell all the doctors regentes that were that tyme at Tholose.
Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 22.

Reason (which in right should be
The special rector of all harmony).
B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

Who shall be the rectors of our daily rioting?
Milton, Areopagitica (ed. Hales), p. 24.

2. In the Ch. of Eng., a clergyman who has the charge of a parish and full possession of all the rights and privileges attached thereto. He differs from the vicar in that the latter is entitled only to a certain proportion of the ecclesiastical income specially set apart to the vicarage. The latter, again, differs from the curate (in the narrower or popular sense of that word), who is subject to the incumbent, whether rector or vicar, and the amount of whose salary is determined not by the law, but by the patron of the benefice, or by the incumbent employing him. Abbreviated Rect.

The bishops that are spoken of in the time of the primitive Church, all such as parsons or rectors of parishes are with us. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 13.

3. In the United States, a clergyman in charge of a parish in the Protestant Episcopal Church. —4. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., an ecclesiastic in charge of a congregation, a college, or a religious house; specifically, the superior of a Jesuit seminary or college.

His wife . . . fled . . . to Saint Jaques le Grand; . . . her death . . . was faithfully confirmed by the rector of the place. Shak., All's Well, iv. 3. 69.

5. The chief elective officer of some universities, as in France and Scotland. In Scotland rector is also the title of the head master of an academy or important public school; in England, of the heads of Exeter and Lincoln colleges, Oxford. In the United States it is a title assumed by the principals of some private schools: as, the rectors of St. John's and St. Paul's. In Germany rector is the title of the head of a higher school; the chief officer of a university is styled rector magnificus or, when the prince of the country is the titular head, rector magnificentissimus.

The rector . . . in the first instance was head of the faculty of arts. . . . It was not until the middle of the 14th century that the rector became the head of the collective university [of Paris]. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 835.

6. The presiding officer or chairman of certain gilds and associations.

Many artists . . . as rectors represented the greater and lesser art guilds in the city government [of Siena].
C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 51.

Lay rector, in the Ch. of Eng., a layman who receives and possesses the rectorial tithes of a benefice. Lee, Glossary. —Missionary rector, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., a priest appointed by the bishop to certain parishes in England, in the United States to the charge of any parish.—Rector of a Board of Trustees, the presiding officer.

rectorage (rek'tọr-āj), n. [OF. rectorage, < rector + -age.] A rector's benefice. Compare vicarage.

Sic pastoris wyll be weill content
To leif vpon the fer les rent,
Nor hes sum Vicare for his waige,
Or Rector for his Rectoraige.
Lauder, Dewtie of Kyngis (E. E. T. S.), l. 326.

rectorate (rek'tọr-āt), n. and a. [< F. rectorat = Sp. rectorado = Pg. reitorado = It. rettorato, < ML. rectoratus, the office of a rector, < L. rector, a rector: see rector.] I. n. The office or rank of rector; the period of incumbency of a rector.

His two rectorates in our city, from 1829 to 1845, saw the beginning of a successful revolt against the leadership of Evangelicals. The American, X. 297.

II. a. Same as rectorial.

His very instructive rectorate address on The Backwardness of the Ancients in Natural Science.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 263.

rectoress, rectress (rek'tọr-es, -tres), n. [< rector + -ess.] 1. A female rector or ruler; a governess. [Rare.]

Be thou alone the rect'ress of this isle,
With all the titles I can thee enstile.
Drayton, Legend of Matilda, st. 39.

Great mother Fortune, queen of human state,
Rectress of action, arbitress of fate.
B. Jonson, Sejanus, v. 4.

2. A rector's wife. [Humorous.]

In this way the worthy Rectoress consoled herself.
Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xlviii.

Also rectrix.

rectorial (rek-tō'ri-al), a. [< rector + -ial.] Of or pertaining to a rector or a rectory.—Rectorial tithes, tithes payable to the rector, ordinarily those of corn, hay, and wood. Also great tithes.

The tithes of many things, as wood in particular, are in some parishes rectorial, and in some vicarial tithes.
Blackstone, Com., I. xi.

rectorship (rek'tọr-ship), n. [< rector + -ship.] 1. The office or rank of a rector.—2†. Rule; direction; guidance.

Why, had your bodies
No heart among you? or had you tongues to cry
Against the rectorship of judgement?
Shak., Cor., iii. 3. 213.

rectory (rek'tọr-i), n.; pl. rectories (-iz). [< OF. rectorie = Sp. rectoría = Pg. reitoria = It. rettoria, < ML. rectoria, the office or rank of a rector, < L. rector, a rector: see rector.] 1. A parish church, parsonage, or spiritual living, with all its rights, tithes, and glebes.—2. A rector's mansion or parsonage-house.

The Rectory was on the other side of the river, close to the church, of which it was the fitting companion.
George Eliot, Felix Holt, xxiii.

rectoscope (rek'tō-skōp), n. [< NL. rectum, rectum, + Gr. σκοπεῖν, view.] A speculum used for rectal examination.

rectostenosis (rek″tō-stē-nō'sis), n. [NL., < rectum (see rectum) + Gr. στένωσις, stricture: see stenosis.] Stricture of the rectum.

rectotomy (rek-tot'ō-mi), n. [< NL. rectum, rectum, + Gr. -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] The operation for dividing a rectal stricture.

recto-urethral (rek″tō-ū-rē'thral), a. Pertaining to the rectum and to the urethra: as, the recto-urethral space (a vertical triangular interval between the membranous urethra above and the rectum below, with the apex at the prostate gland).—Recto-urethral fistula, a fistula connecting the rectum and the urethra.

recto-uterine (rek-tō-ū'tẹ-rin), a. Of or belonging to the rectum and the uterus.—Recto-uterine folds or ligaments, semilunar folds of peritoneum passing one on each side from the rectum to the posterior upper surface of the uterus, forming the lateral walls of the rectovaginal pouch.—Recto-uterine fossa, the space between the uterus and the rectum above the borders of the recto-uterine folds.—Recto-uterine pouch. See pouch.

rectovaginal (rek-tō-vaj'i-nal), a. Of or belonging to the rectum and the vagina.—Rectovaginal fistula, a fistulous opening between the rectum and the vagina.—Rectovaginal hernia. Same as rectocele.—Rectovaginal pouch. See pouch.—Rectovaginal septum, the tissues separating the rectum and the vagina.

rectovesical (rek-tō-ves'i-kal), a. [< NL. rectum + E. vesical.] Of or belonging to the rectum and the bladder.—Rectovesical fascia. See fascia.—Rectovesical folds, the posterior false ligaments of the bladder, lunate folds of peritoneum between the bladder and the rectum in the male. Also called semilunar folds of Douglass.—Rectovesical fossa, the pouch of peritoneum lying between the bladder and the rectum.—Rectovesical pouch. See pouch.

rectress, n. See rectoress.

rectrices, n. Plural of rectrix.

rectricial (rek-trish'al), a. [< NL. rectrix (rectric-), a tail-feather (see rectrix), + -ial.] Of or pertaining to rectrices.

rectrix (rek'triks), n.; pl. rectrices (rek-trī'sēz). [< L. rectrix, directress, governess, mistress, fem. of rector, ruler, governor: see rector.] 1. Same as rectoress.

A late queen rectrix prudently commanded.
Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa. (Latham.)

2. In ornith., a tail-feather; one of the long or large quill-feathers of a bird's tail: so called from its use in directing or steering the course of a bird in flight, like a rudder. The rectrices are comparable to the similar large flight-feathers of the wing, called remiges. In the Saururæ, or Jurassic birds with long lizard-like bony tail, the rectrices are biserially or distichously arranged in a row on each side of the caudal vertebræ. In all modern birds they are set together in a fan-like manner upon the pygostyle. (See Eurhipidura.) In a few birds they are rudimentary, as in grebes. The most frequent number by far is twelve, which prevails (with few anomalous exceptions) throughout the great order Passeres, and also in very many other birds of different orders. In many picarian birds the number is ten; in a very few eight. In various waterbirds the rectrices run up to higher numbers, twenty-four being probably the maximum. There is normally always an even number, these feathers being paired. In size, shape, and texture they are endlessly varied, giving rise to all the different shapes a bird's tail presents.

rectum (rek'tum), n.; pl. recta (-tạ). [= F. rectum = Sp. Pg. recto = It. retto, < NL. rectum, abbr. of L. rectum intestinum, the straight intestine: rectum, neut. of rectus, straight: see right.] In anat. and zoöl., a terminal section of the intestine, ending in the anus: so called from its comparatively straight course in man; the lower bowel: more fully called intestinum rectum. In man the rectum is the continuation of the sigmoid flexure of the colon, beginning about opposite the promontory of the sacrum, a little to the left side, and running through the pelvis to the anus. It is supported by a proper duplication of peritoneum, the mesorectum, and other fasciæ. Its structure includes well-developed longitudinal and circular muscular fibers, the latter being aggregated into a stout internal sphincter muscle near the lower end. In animals whose colon has no special sigmoid flexure there is no distinction of a rectum from the rest of the large intestine; and the term applies only to any given or taken terminal section of the bowel, of whatever character. In mammals above monotremes the rectum is entirely shut off from the urogenital organs, ending in a distinct anus; but in most animals it ends in a cloaca common to the digestive and urogenital systems. The rectum receives the refuse of digestion, and retains the feces until voided. See cuts under intestine, peritoneum, Pulmonata, Pycnogonida, Appendicularia, and Blattidæ.—Columns of the rectum. See column.

rectus (rek'tus), n.; pl. recti (-tī). [NL., abbr. of L. rectus musculus, straight muscle: rectus, straight: see right.] In anat., one of several muscles so called from the straightness of their course, either in their own axis or in the axis of the body or part where they lie.—Recti capitis, five pairs of small muscles, the anticus major and minor, posticus major and minor, and the lateralis, all arising from the lower part of the occipital bone and inserted into the transverse processes of the upper cervical vertebræ.—Rectus abdominis externus. Same as pyramidalis(a).—Rectus abdominis internus, the straight muscle of the abdomen, in the middle line in front, mostly inclosed in an aponeurotic sheath formed by the tendons of other abdominal muscles, usually intersected by several transverse tendons, and extending from the pubis to the sternum, in some animals to the top of the sternum.—Rectus femoris, the anterior part of the quadriceps extensor. It is a fusiform, bipennate muscle, arising by two heads from the ilium, and inserted into the base of the patella. See cut under *muscle*1.—Rectus lateralis, the lateral straight muscle of the head, arising from the transverse process of the axis, and inserted into the jugular process of the occipital.—Rectus medialis oculi. Same as rectus oculi internus.—Rectus oculi externus, inferior, internus, superior, the external, inferior, internal, superior straight muscle of the eyeball, turning the ball outward, downward, inward, or upward. See cut under eyeball.—Rectus sternalis, in man, an occasional slip lying lengthwise upon the sternum, representing the prolongation upward of the rectus abdominis externus, as is normal in many animals.—Rectus thoracis, in man, an occasional slip, similar to the last, but lying deep-seated, supposed to represent the continuation upward of the rectus abdominis internus.

recubant (rek'ū-bant), a. [< L. recuban(t-)s, ppr. of recubare, lie back: see recubation.] Lying down; reclining; recumbent.

recubation (rek-ū-bā'shọn), n. [< L. recubare, pp. recubatus, lie upon the back, lie back, recline: see recumbent.] The act of lying down or reclining. [Rare.]

The French and Italian translations, expressing neither position of session or recubation, do only say that he placed himself at the table. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 6.

recueil (rē-kėy'), n. [F., a collection: see *recule*2.] A collection of writings.

reculet†, v. and n. An obsolete form of *recoil*1.

reculement†, n. An obsolete form of recoilment.

recule1†, v. and n. An obsolete form of *recoil*1.

recule2†, n. [ME., also recuyell, < OF. recueil, F. recueil, a collection, < recueillir, collect: see recollect.] A collection of writings; a book or pamphlet. Caxton; Halliwell.

recultivate (rē-kul'ti-vāt), v. t. [< re- + cultivate. Cf. OF. recultiver, recultivate.] To cultivate anew.

recultivation (rē-kul-ti-vā'shọn), n. [< recultivate + -ion.] The act of cultivating anew, or the state of being cultivated anew.

recumb† (rē-kum'), v. i. [< L. recumbere, lie back, recline: see recumbent.] To recline; lean; repose.

The king makes an overture of pardon and favour unto you, upon condition that any one of you will recumbe, rest, lean upon, or roll himself upon the person of his son.
Barrow, Works, II. iv.

recumbence (rē-kum'bẹns), n. [< recumben(t) + -ce.] Same as recumbency.

A recumbence or reliance upon Christ for justification and salvation. Lord North, Light to Paradise, p. 54.

recumbency (rē-kum'bẹn-si), n. [As recumbence (see -cy).] 1. The state of being recumbent; the posture of reclining, leaning, or lying.

But relaxation of the languid frame,
By soft recumbency of outstretched limbs,
Was bliss reserved for happier days.
Cowper, Task, i. 82.

2. Rest; repose; idleness.

When the mind has been once habituated to this lazy recumbency and satisfaction, . . . it is in danger to rest satisfied there. Locke.

3. The act of reposing or resting in confidence.

There are yet others [Christians] who hope to be saved by a bare act of recumbency on the merits of Christ.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xiv.

recumbent (rē-kum'bẹnt), a. [< L. recumben(t-)s, ppr. of recumbere, lie back, recline, < re-, back, + cubare, lie: see cumbent.] 1. Leaning; reclining.

The Roman recumbent . . . posture in eating was introduced after the first Punic war.
Arbuthnot, Ancient Coins, p. 134.

2. Reposing; inactive; idle; listless.

What smooth emollients in theology
Recumbent virtue's downy doctors preach!
Young, Night Thoughts, iv. 644.

3. In zoöl. and bot., noting a part that leans or reposes upon anything.—Recumbent hairs, in entom., hairs that lie partly against the surface, but are not pressed close to it.

recumbently (rē-kum'bẹnt-li), adv. In a recumbent manner or posture.

recuperability (rē-kū″pẹ-ra-bil'i-ti), n. [< recuperable + -ity (see -bility).] Ability to recuperate; power of recuperation. [Rare.]

A state of almost physiological recuperability.
Alien. and Neurol., VII. 463.

recuperable (rē-kū'pẹ-ra-bl), a. [< ME. recuperable, < OF. recuperable = Sp. recuperable = Pg. recuperavel, < ML. recuperabilis*, < L. recuperare, recover, recuperate: see recuperate, *recover*2. Cf. recoverable.] Recoverable; that may be regained.

And hard it is to ravysshe a treasour
Which of nature is not recuperable.
Lydgate, The Tragedies.

Therfore, if thou yet by counsaile arte recuperable,
Flee thou from idlenesse and alway be stable.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 13.

recuperate (rē-kū'pẹ-rāt), v.; pret. and pp. recuperated, ppr. recuperating. [< L. recuperatus, pp. of recuperare, reciperare (> It. recuperare = Sp. Pg. recuperar = F. récupérer), get again, regain, recover, revive, restore, ML. also intr., revive, convalesce, recover: see *recover*2, the older form in E.] I. trans. 1. To recover; regain: as, to recuperate one's health or spirits.—2. To recoup. [Rare.]

More commonly he [the agent] paid a fixed sum to the clergyman, and recuperated himself by a grinding tyranny of the tenants. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xvi.

II. intrans. To recover; regain strength or health. [U. S.]

recuperation (rē-kū-pẹ-rā'shọn), n. [< OF. recuperation, F. récupération = Sp. recuperación = Pg. recuperação = It. recuperazione, < L. recuperatio(n-), a getting back, regaining, recovery, < recuperare, pp. recuperatus, regain, recover: see recuperate and *recover*2.] 1. Recovery, as of something lost.

The reproduction or recuperation of the same thing that was before. Dr. H. More, Mystery of Godliness, p. 225.

★2. Specifically, recovery of strength or health.

recuperative (rē-kū'pẹ-rā-tiv), a. [= Sp. Pg. recuperativo, < L. recuperativus, recoverable, < recuperare, pp. recuperatus, recover: see *recover*2 and recuperate.] Tending to recovery; pertaining to recovery, especially of strength or health.

The seasons being in turn recuperative, . . . even the frosts of winter impart virtues that pass into summer, preserving the mind's vigor and fertility during the reign of the dog-star. A. B. Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 68.

recuperator (rē-kū′pe-rā-tor), n. [= Sp. Pg. recuperador, < L. recuperator, a recoverer, < recuperare, pp. recuperatus, recover: see recuperate.] 1. One who or that which recuperates or recovers.—2. That part of the Ponsard furnace which answers the same purpose as the regenerator of the Siemens regeneration furnace. See regenerator.

recuperatory (rē-kū′pe-rā-tō-ri), a. [= Sp. Pg. recuperatorio, < L. recuperatorius, < recuperator, a recoverer, < recuperare, pp. recuperatus, recover: see recuperate.] Same as recuperative. Bailey.

recur (rē-kėr′), v. i.; pret. and pp. recurred, ppr. recurring. [< OF. recurer, recorir, recourre, recourir, F. recourir = Pr. recorre = Cat. recorrer = Sp. recurrir = Pg. recorrer = It. ricorrere, < L. recurrere, run back, return, recur, < re-, back, + currere, run: see current[1].] 1. To go or come back; return: literally or figuratively.

When the fear of Popery was over, the Tories recurred to their old principles. Brougham.

And Fancy came and at her pillow sat, . . .
And chased away the still-recurring gnat.
Tennyson, Three Sonnets to a Coquette, i.

2. To return in thought or recollection.

Or seeming-genial venial fault,
Recurring and suggesting still.
Tennyson, Will.

4. To resort; have recourse; turn for aid.

For if his grace were minded, or would intend to do a thing inique or unjust, there were no need to recur unto the pope's holiness for doing thereof. Bp. Burnet, Records, I. ii., No. 22.

5. To occur again or be repeated at stated intervals, or according to some rule.

Food, sleep, amusement recur in uniform succession. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 272.

In volcanic archipelagos . . . the greater eruptions usually recur only after long intervals. Darwin, Geol. Observations, i. 144.

recure[1]† (rē-kūr′), v. [< ME. recuren, < OF. recurer, < L. recurare, restore by taking care of, make whole again, cure, also take care of, prepare carefully, < re-, again, + curare, care, cure: see cure, v. The verb was partly confused with recure[2], ME. recouren, a form of recoveren, recover: see recure[2], recover[2].] I. trans. To cure again; cure; heal.

Which [ills] to recure, we heartily solicit
Your gracious self to take on you the charge
And kingly government of this your land.
Shak., Rich. III., iii. 7. 130.

Jarumannus, a Faithfull Bishop, who with other his fellow Labourers, by sound Doctrin and gentle dealing, soon recur'd them [the East-Saxons] of thir second relaps. Milton, Hist. Eng., iv.

II. intrans. To recover; get well.

Rabert Lauerawns is wele amendyd, and I hope xall recure. Paston Letters, I. 112.

recure[1]† (rē-kūr′), n. [< ME. recure; < recure[2], partly < recure[1], v.] Recovery.

Recure to fynde of myn adversite.
Lydgate, Complaint of a Lover's Life, l. 681.

Had she been my daughter,
My care could not be greater than it shall be
For her recure. Middleton, Spanish Gypsy, iii. 2.

recure[2]† (rē-kūr′), v. t. [Early mod. E. also recoure; < ME. recuren, recouren, var. of recoveren, recover: see recover[2].] To recover; get again.

Fredom of kynde so lost hath he
That never may recured be.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 4920.

But Hector fyrst, of strength most assured,
His stede agayne hath anone recured.
Lydgate, Troye (1555), sig. P, v. (Halliwell.)

For sometimes Paridell and Blandamour
The better had, and bet the others backe:
Eftsoones the others did the field recoure.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. ix. 25.

recureful† (rē-kūr′fûl), a. [< recure[1] + -ful.] Curative; healing.

Let me forever hide this staine of beauty
With this recureful maske.
Chapman, Gentleman Usher, v. 1.

recureless† (rē-kūr′les), a. [< ME. rekeurles; < recure[1] + -less.] Incapable of recovery or remedy; incurable.

Ye are to blame to sette yowre hert so sore,
Sethyn that ye wote that hyt [ys] rekeurles.
MS. Cantab. Ff. i. 6, f. 14. (Halliwell.)

My recureless sore. G. Ferrars.

'Tis foolish to bewail recureless things.
Greene, James the Fourth, ii.

recurelessly† (rē-kūr′les-li), adv. So as not to be cured.

Recurelesly wounded with his own weapons.
Greene, Groats-worth of Wit (Works, ed. Dyce, Int., p. xxvi.).

recurrence (rē-kur′ens), n. [= F. récurrence; as recurren(t) + -ce.] 1. The act of recurring, or the state of being recurrent; return.

Atavism, which is the name given to the recurrence of ancestral traits, is proved by many and varied facts. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 83.

2. Resort; the having recourse.

In the use of this, as of every kind of alleviation, I shall insensibly go on from a rare to a frequent recurrence to the dangerous preparations. Jer. Taylor.

recurrency (rē-kur′en-si), n. [As recurrence (see -cy).] Same as recurrence. Bailey.

★ recurrent (rē-kur′ent), a. and n. [< OF. recurrent, F. récurrent = Pg. recurrente = It. ricorrente, < L. recurren(t-)s, ppr. of recurrere, run back, return, recur: see recur.] I. a. 1. Recurring; returning from time to time; reappearing; repeated: as, recurrent pains of a disease. Prof. Blackie.

The music would swell out again, like chimes borne onward by a recurrent breeze.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, v. 1.

Nature, with all her changes, is secure in certain noble recurrent types. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 150.

2. In crystal., noting a crystal which exhibits an oscillatory combination of two sets of planes. See oscillatory.—3. In anat., turned back in its course, and running in a direction the opposite of its former one: specifically noting the inferior laryngeal branch of the pneumogastric. See the following phrases.—4. In entom., turning back toward the base: as, a recurrent process.—Posterior interosseous recurrent artery, a branch of the posterior interosseous artery which gives off branches in the region of the olecranon which anastomose with the superior profunda, posterior ulnar recurrent, and radial recurrent arteries.—Radial recurrent artery. See radial.—Recurrent arteries of the deep palmar arch, branches which pass from the upper side of the palmar arch and anastomose with branches of the anterior carpal arch.—Recurrent branch of the ophthalmic nerve, a small branch arising near the Gasserian ganglion, and running backward across the fourth nerve to be distributed in the tentorium.—Recurrent fever. See fever[1].—Recurrent fibroid tumor. Same as small spindle-cell sarcoma. See sarcoma.—Recurrent laryngeal. See laryngeal.—Recurrent mania. Same as periodical mania.—Recurrent nerve. Same as meningeal nerve (which see, under nerve).—Recurrent nerve of the inferior maxillary, a branch from the inferior maxillary as it passes through the foramen ovale, which passes back into the skull through the foramen spinosum, giving rise to two branches, one going to the great wing of the sphenoid, the other to the mastoid cells.—Recurrent nerve of the superior maxillary, a branch given off from the superior maxillary near its origin, which passes to the dura mater and middle meningeal artery.—Recurrent nervure of an insect's wing. (a) A branch which is more or less turned toward the base of the wing, in a direction contrary to the nervure from which it arises. Many of these recurrent nervures are distinguished. (b) A vein of the wing which, after running toward the apex, is bent or curved back toward the base, as in many Coleoptera.—Recurrent pulse. See pulse[1].—Recurrent radial artery, an artery which arises from the radial artery near its origin, and anastomoses with the anterior terminal branch of the superior profunda.—Recurrent sensibility, the sensibility manifested by the anterior root of a spinal nerve. This is due to fibers derived from the posterior root.—Recurrent tibial arteries. (a) The posterior, arising near the perforation of the interosseous membrane, and anastomosing with the lower articular popliteal arteries. (b) The anterior, a larger branch, arising just behind the perforation of the interosseous membrane, and anastomosing with the lower articular popliteal arteries.—Recurrent ulnar arteries. (a) The anterior, arising from the upper part of the ulnar, and joining the anastomotic branch of the brachial. (b) The posterior, arising a little lower than the anterior (though they often have a common origin), and communicating with the inferior profunda, the anastomotic, and posterior interosseous recurrent.

II. n. Any recurrent nerve or artery.

recurrently (rē-kur′ent-li), adv. In a recurrent manner; with recurrence.

For a long time I had under observation a middle-aged man who, throughout his life, has recurrently been tormented by this parasite. B. W. Richardson, Preventive Medicine, p. 568.

★ recurring (rē-kėr′ing), p. a. Returning again.—Recurring continued fraction. See continued fraction, under continued.—Recurring decimal. See decimal.—Recurring series, in alg., a series in which the coefficients of the successive powers of x are formed from a certain number of the preceding coefficients according to some invariable law. Thus, $a + bx + (a + b)x^2 + (a + 2b)x^3 + (2a + 3b)x^4 + (3a + 5b)x^5 + \ldots$ is a recurring series.—Recurring utterances, a form of aphasia in which the patient can repeat only the word last uttered when taken ill.

recursant (rē-kėr′sant), a. [< L. recursan(t-)s, ppr. of recursare, run or hasten back, come back, return, recur, freq. of recurrere, run back, recur: see recur.] In her., turned in a way contrary to the usual position, or with the back displayed instead of the front. Thus, an eagle recursant shows the back of the bird with the wings crossed.—Displayed recursant. See displayed.

recursion (rē-kėr′shon), n. [< L. recursio(n-), a running back, return, < recurrere, pp. recursus, run back, return: see recur.] Return. [Rare.]

When the receiver was full of air, the included pendulum continued its recursions about fifteen minutes. Boyle, Works, I. 61.

recurvant (rē-kėr′vant), a. [< L. recurvan(t-)s, ppr. of recurvare, bend or curve backward, turn back: see recurve.] In her., of a serpent, coiled up, with the head projecting from the folds; bowed-embowed.

recurvate (rē-kėr′vāt), v. t. [< L. recurvatus, pp. of recurvare, bend backward, curve back: see recurve.] Same as recurve. Imp. Dict.

recurvate (rē-kėr′vāt), a. [< L. recurvatus, pp.: see recurvate, v.] In bot. and zoöl., recurved.

recurvation (rē-kėr-vā′shon), n. [< recurvate + -ion.] The act or process of recurving; the state of being curved up or back: opposed to decurvation: as, the recurvation of a bird's bill. Also recurvature, recurvity.

By a serpentine and trumpet recurvation, it [the windpipe] ascendeth again into the neck. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 27.

recurvature (rē-kėr′vā-tūr), n. [< recurvate + -ure.] Same as recurvation.

recurve (rē-kėrv′), v. [= OF. recorber, recurber, recourber, F. recourber = Pr. Pg. recurvar, < L. recurvare, bend or curve backward, turn up or back, < re-, back, + curvare, curve: see curve, v.] I. trans. To curve back; turn backward. Also recurvate.

II. intrans. To be recurved.

recurved (rē-kėrvd′), p. a. 1. In bot., curved back or downward: as, a recurved leaf, petal, etc.—2. In zoöl., bent upward: the opposite of decurved: as, the recurved beak of the avoset.

recurviroster (rē-kėr-vi-ros′tėr), n. [< NL. recurvirostrus, < L. recurvus, bent or curved back, crooked (see recurvous), + rostrum, beak, bill: see rostrum.] A bird of the genus Recurvirostra; an avoset.

Recurvirostra (rē-kėr-vi-ros′trą), n. [NL., fem. of recurvirostrus: see recurviroster.] A genus of precocial limicoline grallatorial birds, type of the family Recurvirostridæ, having a long and very slender depressed and recurved bill, extremely long slender legs, and four toes, the three front ones of which are webbed; the avosets. The body is depressed, and the under parts are clothed with thick plumage like a duck's, so that the birds swim with ease by means of their webbed feet. See avoset. Also called Avocetta.

recurvirostral (rē-kėr-vi-ros′tral), a. [As recurviroster + -al.] Having a recurved bill, as an avoset; belonging to the genus Recurvirostra; pertaining to a recurviroster.

Recurvirostridæ (rē-kėr-vi-ros′tri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Recurvirostra + -idæ.] A family of wading birds with long and slender bill and legs, typified by the genus Recurvirostra, and divided into the Recurvirostrinæ and Himantopodinæ; the avosets and stilts.

Recurvirostrinæ (rē-kėr″vi-ros-trī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Recurvirostra + -inæ.] A subfamily of Recurvirostridæ, having the characters of the genus Recurvirostra, as distinguished from those of Himantopus, and including only the avosets.

recurvity (rē-kėr′vi-ti), n. [< L. recurvus, bent back (see recurvous), + -ity.] Same as recurvation. Bailey.

recurvo-patent (rē-kėr′vō-pat″ent), a [< L. recurvus, bent back, + paten(t-)s, open, spreading: see patent[1].] In bot., bent back and spreading.

recurvous (rē-kėr′vus), a. [= Pg. recurvo = It. ricurvo, < L. recurvus, bent or curved back, < re-, back, + curvus, curve: see curve.] Bent backward.

recusance (rek′ū-zans), n. [< recusan(t) + -ce.] Same as recusancy.

The parliament now passed laws prohibiting Catholic worship, and imposing a fine of one shilling, payable each Sunday, for recusance. W. S. Gregg, Irish Hist. for Eng. Readers, p. 54.

recusancy (rek′ū-zan-si), n. [As recusance (see -cy).] 1. Obstinate refusal or opposition.

It is not a recusancy, for I would come; but it is an excommunication, I must not.
Donne, Devotions, III., Expostulation.

If any one, or two, or ten, or twenty members of congress should manifest symptoms of recusancy, . . . the weird sisters of ambitious hearts shall play before their eyes images of foreign missions, and departments, and benches of justice. R. Choate, Addresses, p. 339.

2. The state of being a recusant.

The papists made no scruple of coming to our churches; recusancy was not then so much as a chrisom, not an embryo. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 98.

There is also an inferior species of recusancy (refusing to make the declaration against popery enjoined by statute 30 Car. II. st. 2, when tendered by the proper magistrate). Blackstone, Com., IV. iv.

We shall see that mere recusancy was first made punishable, later on in the reign, by the Second Act for Uniformity of Edward.
R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv., note.

3. The tenets of the recusants, or adherence to those tenets.

The penalties of recusancy were particularly hard upon women, who . . . adhered longer to the old religion than the other sex. Hallam, Const. Hist., vii., note.

recusant (rek′ū-zant or rē-kū′zant), a. and n. [< OF. recusant, F. récusant = Sp. Pg. recusante = It. ricusante, < L. recusan(t-)s, ppr. of recusare, reject, object: see recuse.] I. a. Obstinate in refusal; specifically, in Eng. hist., refusing to attend divine service in Anglican churches, or to acknowledge the ecclesiastical supremacy of the crown.

No recusant lord might have a vote in passing that act.
Clarendon.

II. n. 1. One obstinate in refusing; one who will not conform to general opinion or practice.

The last rebellious recusants among the family of nations. De Quincey.

He that would not take the oath should be executed, though unarmed; and the recusants were shot on the roads, . . . or as they stood in prayer.
Bancroft, Hist. U. S., II. 411.

2. Specifically, in Eng. hist., one who refused to attend divine worship in Anglican churches, or to acknowledge the ecclesiastical supremacy of the crown. Heavy penalties were inflicted on such persons, but they pressed far more lightly on the simple recusant or nonconformist than on the Roman Catholic recusant, the chief object being to secure national unity and loyalty to the crown, in opposition to papal excommunications, which declared British subjects absolved from their allegiance (as in 1570), and to plots against the government. The name recusant, though legally applied to both Protestants and Roman Catholics, was in general given especially to the latter.

As well those restrained . . . as generally all the papists in this kingdom, not any of them did refuse to come to our church, and yield their formal obedience to the laws established. And thus they all continued, not any one refusing to come to our churches, during the first ten years of her Majesty's [Queen Elizabeth's] government. And in the beginning of the eleventh year of her reign, Cornwallis, Bedingfield, and Silyarde were the first recusants, they absolutely refusing to come to our churches. And until they in that sort began, the name of recusant was never heard of amongst us.
Sir Edward Coke [in 1607], in Blunt, Annotated Book of [Common Prayer, p. 24.

recusation (rek-ū-zā′shon), n. [< OF. recusation, F. récusation = Pr. recusation = Sp. recusación = Pg. recusação = It. ricusazione, < L. recusatio(n-), a declining, refusal, objection, protest, also nausea, rejection, < recusare, pp. recusatus, object, decline, reject: see recuse.] In law, the interposition of an objection or challenge for cause to a judge or arbitrator, or to an expert appointed by a court; also, the objection or challenge so presented.

He [Bonner], to deface his Authority (as he thought), did also then exhibit in writing a Recusation of the Secretaries Judgment against him.
Foxe, Martyrs, II. 85, an. 1549.

recusative (rē-kū′zā-tiv), a. [< recuse + -ative.] Tending or prone to recuse or refuse; refusing; denying; negative. [Rare.]

The act of the will produces material and permanent events; it is acquisitive and effective, or recusative and destructive, otherwise than it is in any other faculties.
Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, IV. i. 1.

recuse (rē-kūz′), v. t.; pret. and pp. recused, ppr. recusing. [< OF. recuser, F. récuser = Pr. Sp. Pg. recusar = It. ricusare, < L. recusare, object, decline, reject, refuse, protest against, plead in defense, < re-, back, + causa, a cause: see cause. Cf. accuse.] To refuse; reject; specifically, in law, to reject or challenge (a judge or juror) as disqualified to act.

Yet she [the queen] nevertheless persisting in her former wilfulness and in her Appeal, which also by the said Judges was likewise recused, incontinently departed out of the Court. Bp. Burnet, Records, I. ii., No. 28.

A judge may proceed notwithstanding my appeal, unless I recuse him as a suspected judge. Ayliffe, Parergon.

recussion (rē-kush′on), n. [< L. recutere, pp. recussus, strike back, beat back, etc., < re-, back, + quatere, strike, shake: see quash[1]. Cf. concussion, discussion, percussion.] The act of beating back. Bailey.

red[1] (red), a. and n. [< ME. red, reed, rede, earlier read, reod, < AS. reád = OS. rōd = OFries. rād = D. rood = MLG. rōt, LG. rod = OHG. From the E. root, besides redden, reddish, etc., are derived rud, ruddle, ruddock, ruddy, rust, etc.; from the L. are derived E. ruby, rubescent, rubric, rubicund, rufous, russet, rutilate, rutilant; from the Gr. are Erythræa, erythric, etc. Red, like lead[2] (led), with which it is phonetically parallel, had in ME. a long vowel, which has become shortened. The long vowel remains, however, in the surnames Read, Reade, Reed, Reid, which represent old forms of the adj., and the existence of which as surnames explains the almost total absence of the expected surname Red, parallel to Black, Brown, White, etc. As a noun, cf. ME. rede, redness, = OHG. rōti, G. röthe, redness, red; from the adj.] I. a. 1. Of a bright, warm color resembling that of blood or of the highest part of the primary rainbow. See II.

Dropes rede as ripe cherrees,
That fro his flesshe gan lave.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 217.

The ladye blushed scarlette redde,
And fette a gentill sighe.
Sir Cauline (Child's Ballads, III. 181).

Your colour, I warrant you, is as red as any rose.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 4. 28.

2. Ultra-radical; revolutionary; violent: from the use of a red flag as a revolutionary emblem: as, a red republican.

Ev'n tho' thrice again
The red fool-fury of the Seine
Should pile her barricades with dead.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxxvii.

The Social Democratic Federation has degenerated into a red Anarchist organization. The Nation, XLVII. 450.

Black-breasted red game. See game[1].—Neither flesh, fowl, nor good red herring, nondescript; lacking distinctive character; neither one thing nor another: same as neither hay nor grass.—Order of the Red Eagle. See eagle.—Red adder. Same as copperhead, 1. Bartlett.—Red admiral. See admiral, 5.—Red algæ, red or purplish seaweeds forming the class Rhodophyceæ. Formerly known as Rhodosporeæ and Rhodospermeæ. See Rhodospermeæ and Algæ.—Red ant, a small ant of a red color, as Pharaoh's ant and some similar species. See cut under Monomorium.—Red antimony. Same as kermesite.—Red arsenic. Same as realgar.—Red ash, band-fish, bark, bay. See the nouns.—Red bat, the common New York bat, Lasiurus or Atalapha noveboracensis, a small reddish bat of wide distribution in North America, and one of the most abundant in eastern parts of the United States. It is rather larger than the brown bat, Vespertilio subulatus, and easily recognized by its coloration and the densely furry interfemoral membrane.—Red bead-vine. See Rhynchosia.—Red bear-cat, the panda or wah. See cut under panda.—Red beds, a conspicuous formation in the Rocky Mountains; a series of deep-red, sandy, gypsiferous strata lying upon the Carboniferous, and generally considered to be of Triassic age. They are often eroded into fantastic and picturesque forms.—Red beech, beefwood, birch, bird's-eye. See the nouns.—Red body, in ichth., an aggregation of capillaries forming a gland-like body.

These tufts of radiating capillaries are much localized at various places, as in Esocidæ; or the tufts are so aggregated as to form gland-like red bodies, the capillaries reuniting into larger vessels, which again ramify freely round the border of the red body.

II. n. 1. A color more or less resembling that of blood or the lower end of the spectrum. Red is one of the most general color-names, and embraces colors ranging in hue from rose aniline to scarlet iodide of mercury and red lead. A red yellower than vermilion is called scarlet; one much more purple is called crimson. A very dark red, if pure or crimson, is called maroon; if brownish, chestnut or chocolate. A pale red—that is, one of low chroma and high luminosity—is called a pink, ranging from rose-pink, or pale crimson, to salmon-pink, or pale scarlet.

2. A red pigment. The most useful reds for painting are carmine, obtained from the cochineal-insect; the lakes and madders, of vegetable origin; vermilion, chrome-red, Indian red, and burnt sienna.

3. An object of a red color, as wine, gold, etc.

> Now kepe yow fro the whyte and fro the rede,
> And namely fro the whyte wyn of Lepe,
> That is to selle in Fish strete or in Chepe.
> Chaucer, Pardoner's Tale, l. 100.

> No pint of white or red
> Had ever half the power to turn
> This wheel within my head.
> Tennyson, Will Waterproof.

4. Specifically, a red cent. See under I. [Slang, U. S.]—5. A red republican (which see, under republican).—6. pl. The catamenial discharges; menses.—Adrianople red. Same as Turkey red.—Alizarin red, in leather-manuf., a pale flesh-color produced by rubbing the cleansed and trodden skins with a solution of alizarin or extract of madder in weak soda-lye, and rinsing in water. C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 735.—Aniline red. Same as fuchsin.—Anisol red, a coal-tar color of the oxy-azo group, formerly used in dyeing silk and wool, but not now a commercial product.—Antimony red, a sulphid of antimony suggested as a pigment, but not permanent: used for coloring rubber and the heads of friction-matches.—Aurora red, a light red, like that of the spinel ruby.—Barwood red. See barwood.—Bengal red, a coal-tar color used in dyeing. It produces brilliant reds similar to those of eosin, but more blue in tone. It is the alkali salt of tetraiododichloro-fluorescein. Also called rose bengale.—Bristol red, a dye for stuffs, in favor in the sixteenth century.

> Her kyrtel Brystow red.
> Skelton, Elynour Rummyng, l. 70.

Brown red. Same as red ocher (which see, under ocher).—Cadmium red, an artists' pigment composed of the cadmium sulphid. It is more orange in hue than vermilion, but is very brilliant and permanent.—Chica or chico red. See chico, 1.—Cobalt red, a phosphate of cobalt sometimes used as an artists' color. It is durable, but poor in hue.—Congo red, a coal-tar color used in dyeing. It may be applied to cotton and wool, producing a bright scarlet fast to soap, but not to light or acids. It is a sodium salt of a tetrazo dye from benzidine.—Corallin red, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, produced by treating aurin with ammonia at a high temperature. It is used by calico- and woolen-printers, but is quite fugitive. See coralline, 3.—English red. Same as Venetian red.—Fast red, a coal-tar color used in dyeing a garnet-red on woolen. It is of complex composition, and belongs to the azo-group. Also known in commerce as rocellin, orseillin, rubidin, and rauracienne.—French red, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, being a mixture of claret-red and naphthol orange.—Indian red, an important pigment used by artists and house-painters. Originally it was a natural earth rich in oxid of iron, brought from India. It is now prepared artificially by heating iron sulphate in a reverberatory furnace. The sulphuric acid is driven off, and the iron is immediately oxidized to the red oxid. The color varies from a purple to a light-yellowish red, according to the temperature at which the process is conducted. It is a color of much body, and is very permanent. Also called Indian ocher.—Jewelers' red. See jeweler.—Light red, a light yellowish-red oxid of iron prepared similarly to Indian red. It is also sometimes made by calcining Oxford ocher. It is used as an artists' pigment.—Madder-red. See madder[1].—Magdala red, a coal-tar color used to produce bright pinks on silk. It is the hydrochlorid of the base rosa-naphthylamine.—Mars red, a pigment used by artists. It is somewhat similar in composition and color to Indian red.—Mock Turkey red. See barwood.—Naphthalene red. See naphthalene.—New red. See fuchsin.—Paris red. Same as mauvein.—Peony red. Same as corallin red.—Persian red. Same as the normal form of Indian red.—Phenetol red. Same as coccinin.—Piccolpasso red, a name given to the deep red of the Italian majolica, obtained by the use of silicate of alumina, in which there is much oxid of iron, and applied upon the yellow enamel already fired: so called from Piccolpasso, a sixteenth-century writer on Italian potteries.—Pompadour red. See rose pompadour, under rose[2].—Pompeian red. See Pompeian.—Prussian red. Same as Venetian red.—Saturnine red. Same as red lead (which see, under lead[2]).—Spanish red. Same as Venetian red.—Turkey red, an intense scarlet red produced on fabrics by dyeing with the color-giving principles of the madder-root. This has been almost entirely superseded by exactly the same color produced on fabrics by means of artificial alizarin. See alizarin. Also called Adrianople red.—Turkey-red oil, an oil with which cloth is treated in dyeing the color called Turkey red. It is prepared by mixing castor-oil with dilute sulphuric acid; the acid is then washed away with a solution of common salt, and the fatty acids saponified with ammonia. The oil consists chiefly of ammonium sulpho-ricinoleate. Compare Gallipoli oil, under oil.—Venetian red, an important pigment used by artists and house-painters. Formerly it was a natural earth simulating Indian red. It is now made by calcining a mixture of lime and iron sulphate, the resulting product being a mixture of calcium sulphate and oxid of iron in nearly equal proportions. It is somewhat darker than brick-red in color, and is very permanent. (See also chrome-red, claret-red.) red[1] (red), v. t.; pret. and pp. redded, ppr. redding. Cf. rendition.] 1. A returning of something; restitution; surrender.

She [Ireland] is . . . reduc'd . . . to a perfect obedience, . . . partly by voluntary reddition and desire of protection, and partly by conquest.
Howell, Vocall Forrest, p. 32.

2. Explanation; rendering.

When they used [to carry branches] in procession about their altars, they used to pray "Lord, save us; Lord, prosper us"; which hath occasioned the reddition of "Hoschiannah" to be, amongst some, that prayer which they repeated at the carrying of the "Hoschiannah," as if itself did signify "Lord, save us."
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 288.

3. In law, a judicial acknowledgment that the thing in demand belongs to the demandant, and not to the adversary. [Rare.]

redditive (red′i-tiv), a. [< L. redditivus, of or belonging to the apodosis (in gram.), consequential (cf. redditio, the apodosis of a clause), < reddere, pp. redditus, give back: see reddition.] Conveying a reply; answering: as, redditive words.

For this sad sequel is, if not a relative, yet a redditive demonstration of their misery; for after the infection of sin follows that infliction of punishment.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 261.

★reddle (red′l), n. [Also raddle; var. of ruddle[1], q. v.] An earthy variety of hematite iron ore. It is fine-grained, and sufficiently compact to be cut into strips, which are used for various purposes, as for marking sheep and drawing on board. This material is found in several localities in England, and much more rarely in the United States, where it is generally called red chalk.

Reddle spreads its lively hues over everything it lights on, and stamps unmistakably, as with the mark of Cain, any person who has handled it for half an hour.
T. Hardy, Return of the Native, i. 9.

reddleman (red'l-man), n.; pl. reddlemen (-men). [< reddle + -man.] A dealer in reddle or red chalk, usually a sort of peddler. Also raddleman, ruddleman.

Raddleman then is a Reddleman, a trade (and that a poor one) only in this county [Rutland], whence men bring on their backs a pack of red stones, or ochre, which they sell to the neighbouring countries for the marking of sheep. Fuller, Worthies, Rutlandshire, III. 38.

Reddlemen of the old school are now but seldom seen. Since the introduction of railways Wessex farmers have managed to do without these somewhat spectral visitants, and the bright pigment so largely used by shepherds in preparing sheep for the fair is obtained by other routes. T. Hardy, Return of the Native, i. 9.

reddock (red'ok), n. Same as ruddock. [Prov. ★Eng.]

red-dog (red'dog), n. The lowest grade of flour produced in the roller-milling processes. Originally the term was applied to a poor flour made from middlings; now it is applied to the lowest grade produced by the new-process milling.

From which I would redeem you. Tennyson, Princess, iv.

5. In theol., to deliver from sin and spiritual death by means of a sacrifice offered for the sinner. See redemption (c).

I learn to believe in . . . God the Son, who hath redeemed me, and all mankind. Book of Common Prayer, Catechism.

Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us. Gal. iii. 13.

6. To perform or fulfil, as a promise; make good by performance: as, to redeem an obligation.

Had he lived, I doubt not that he would have redeemed the rare promise of his earlier years. O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 69.

7. To make amends for; atone for; compensate for.

This feather stirs; she lives; if it be so,
It is a chance which does redeem all sorrows
That ever I have felt. Shak., Lear, v. 3. 266.

You have shewn much worth this day, redeem'd much error. Fletcher, Bonduca, v. 5.

Passages of considerable beauty, especially in the last two acts, frequently occur; but there is nothing to redeem the absurdity of the plot. Gifford, Int. to Ford's Plays, p. xxii.

To redeem defeat by new thought, by firm action, that is not easy. Emerson, Success.

Detect at least
A touch of wolf in what showed whitest sheep,
A cross of sheep redeeming the whole wolf.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 27.

8. To improve, or employ to the best advantage.

Redeeming the time, because the days are evil. Eph. v. 16.

But peaceful measures were also employed to procure the redemption of slaves; and money sometimes accomplished what was vainly attempted by the sword. Sumner, Orations, I. 232.

Such a sacrifice
Alone the fates can deem a fitting price
For thy redemption.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 318.

Specifically—(a) In law, the recovering or disencumbering of property by one who had a right to it subject to the encumbrance or defeasible conveyance, as where a debtor by paying his debt gets back a pledge or a mortgaged estate; also, the right of redeeming and reëntering. (b) In com., payment to the holders by the issuer of notes, bills, or other evidences of debt. (c) In theol., deliverance from sin and its consequences by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ the Redeemer. The word redemption presupposes that man is in a state of bondage to the powers of evil—either spiritual powers external to himself, or evil passions and propensities within himself, or both—and that he can be delivered from them only by the sacrifice and suffering of another. This suffering is regarded as the price or ransom paid to redeem the captive. Thus, redemption is substantially equivalent to salvation, but involves the idea of a new and additional right over man acquired by God; and the doctrine of redemption includes the doctrines of atonement, justification, regeneration, and sanctification.

The Mounte of Caluery, where our Sauyour Criste was crucyfyed and suffred dethe for our redempcion. Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 26.

Plantagenet,
Which held thee dearly as his soul's redemption.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 1. 102.

By sin man was principally bound to God, as relates to punishment, because he had principally sinned against God; but he was bound to the devil as a tormentor, to whom he was justly delivered by God's permission; but the price of redemption ought to be paid to the principal, not to the intervening agent, and therefore Christ exhibited His death as the price of our redemption to God the Father for our reconciliation, and not to the devil. Durandus, in Owen's Dogmatic Theology, p. 279.

Brethren of the Redemption of Captives. See brother. —Covenant of redemption, in New Eng. theol. See covenant.—Equity of redemption. See equity.

It is employed for railway-ties, piles, many ship-building purposes, etc.

red-gum[2] (red′gum), n. [A corruption of redgound, q. v.] An unimportant red papular eruption of infants. Also called gum-rash and strophulus.

Their heads are hid with skalls,
Their Limbs with Red-gums.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Furies.

I found Charlotte quite in a fuss about the child: she was sure it was very ill; it cried and fretted, and was all over pimples. So I looked at it directly, and "Lord! my dear," says I, "it is nothing in the world but the red-gum."
Jane Austen, Sense and Sensibility, xxxvii.

red-haired (red′hārd), a. [= Icel. raudhhærdhr; as red[1] + hair + -ed[2].] Having red or reddish hair.

red-hand (red′hand), a. Same as red-handed.

red-handed (red′han″ded), a. With red or bloody hands; hence, in the very act, as if with red or bloody hands: said originally of a person taken in the act of homicide, but extended figuratively to one caught in the perpetration of any crime: generally in the phrase to be taken red-handed.

I was pushed over by Pumblechook, exactly as if I had that moment picked a pocket, or fired a rick; indeed it was the general impression in court that I had been taken red-handed; for as Pumblechook shoved me before him through the crowd I heard some people say, "What's he done?" and others, "He's a young 'un too."
Dickens, Great Expectations, xiii.

redhead (red′hed), n. [< red[1] + head, n.] 1. A person having red hair.—2. redour†, reddour†, n. [< ME. redour, redur, also raddour, reddour, reddur, < OF. rador, radour, radeur, violence, rapidity, < rade, < L. rapidus, rapid (see rapid); prob. confused also with raidour, raideur, roideur, stiffness, < L. rigidus, stiff, rigid: see rigid.] Violence; roughness.

His londes, his legemen, out of lyue broght;
His suster into seruage & to syn put;
And other redurs full ryfe in his rewme dyd.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 1805.

But trewely no fors of thi reddour
To hym that over hymself hath the maystrye.
Chaucer, Fortune, l. 14.

redout[1]†, v. See redoubt[1].

redout[2], redoubt[2] (rē-dout′), n. [The form redoubt is erroneous, due to confusion with redoubt[1] and redoubtable; prop. redout (= D. G. redoute = Sw. redutt = Dan. redute), formerly also reduit (and, after L., reduct); < OF. reduit, m., reduite, f., F. réduit, also (fem. It.) redoute = Sp. reducto = Pg. reducto, reduto = It. ridotto, a retreat, refuge, redout, < ML. reductus (> E. reduct), a retreat, refuge, redout, < L. reducere, bring back: see reduce.] In fort., a general name for nearly every class of works wholly inclosed and undefended by reëntering or flanking angles. The word is, however, most generally used for a small inclosed work of various form—polygonal, square, triangular, or even circular—serving mainly as a temporary field-work. The name is also given to a central or retired work constructed within another, to serve as a place of retreat for the defenders: in this sense generally reduit. Redouts are usually provided with parapet, ditch, scarps, banquette, etc., as in regular fortification. They are especially useful in fortifying the tops of hills, in commanding passes, or in feeling the way through a hostile or wooded country.—Demilune redout, a redout placed within the demilune.=Syn. See fortification.

redout[3] (rē-dout′), a. [< OF. reduit, < L. reductus, brought back, pp. of reducere, bring back: see reduce. Cf. redout[2], n.] In her., bent in many angles: noting a cross with hooked extremities, in the form of the fylfot or swastika.

redoutable, a. See redoubtable.

redowa (red′ō-ä), n. [< F. redowa, < Bohem. rejdowák, rejdowachka, the dance so called, < rejdowati, turn, turn around, bustle about.] 1. A Bohemian dance, which has two forms—the rejdowák, resembling the waltz or the mazurka, and the rejdowachka, resembling the polka.—2. Music for such a dance or in its rhythm, which is properly triple and quick, but in another form is duple, and readily assimilated to that of the polka.

red-paidle, n. The lumpsucker. [Scotch.]

redpoll (red′pōl), n. [Also redpole: so called ★from the red color on the head; < red[1] + poll[1].] 1. A small fringilline bird of the genus Ægiothus (or Acanthis), the male of which has a crimson poll, a rosy-red breast, and the plumage streaked with flaxen and dusky brown and white. The bill is small, conic-acute, with a nasal ruff; the wings are pointed; the tail is emarginate. Several species inhabit the arctic and north temperate regions of Europe, Asia, and America. The common redpoll is Æ. linaria; the mealy redpoll is Æ. canescens; the American mealy redpoll is Æ. exilipes.

Redpoll (Ægiothus linaria).

2. The red-polled warbler, or palm-warbler, of North America, Dendræca palmarum, having a chestnut-red poll: more fully called yellow red-poll. See palm-warbler.

red-polled (red′pōld), a. Having a red poll, or the top of the head red.

redraft (rē-drȧft′), v. t. [< re- + draft.] To draft or draw anew.

redraft (rē-drȧft′), n. [< redraft, v.] 1. A second draft or copy.—2. A new bill of exchange which the holder of a protested bill draws on the drawer or indorsers, by which he reimburses to himself the amount of the protested bill with costs and charges.

redraw (rē-drâ′), v. [< re- + draw.] I. trans. To draw again; make a second draft or copy of.

II. intrans. In com., to draw a new bill of exchange to meet another bill of the same amount, or, as the holder of a protested bill, on the drawer or indorser.

redress[1] (rē-dres′), v. [< ME. redressen, < OF. redrescer, redrecer, redrecier, redresser, F. redresser, set up again, straighten, < re-, again, + dresser, direct, dress: see dress.] I. trans. 1†. To set up or upright; make erect; reërect.

Right as floures, thorgh the cold of nyghte
Yclosed, stoupen on her stalkes lowe,
Redressen hem agein the sonne brighte.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 969.

2. To set right again; restore; amend; mend.

Redresse me, mooder, and me chastise;
For certeynly my Faderes chastisinge,
That dar I nought abiden in no wise.
Chaucer, A. B. C., l. 129.

As broken glass no cement can redress,
So beauty blemish'd once 's for ever lost.
Shak., Pass. Pilgrim, l. 178.

In yonder spring of roses intermix'd
With myrtle, find what to redress till noon.
Milton, P. L., ix. 219.

3. To put right, as a wrong; remedy; repair, relieve against, as an injury: as, to redress injuries; to redress grievances. See redress[1], n., 2.

And redresse vs the domage that he don has,
By Paris his proude son, in our prise londis.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 4917.

Orisouns or preyers is for to seyn a pitous wyl of herte that redresseth it in God and expresseth it by word outward to remoeven harmes. Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

The state of this unconstant world . . . bringeth forth daily such new evils as must of necessity by new remedies be redrest. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vi. 2.

Their duty
And ready service shall redress their needs,
Not prating what they would be.
Fletcher, Valentinian, ii. 3.

He who best knows how to keep his necessities private is the most likely person to have them redressed.
Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 3.

4. To relieve of anything unjust or oppressive; bestow relief upon; compensate; make amends to.

Redres mans sowle from alle mysery,
That he may enter the eternal glorye.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 82.

Will Gaul or Muscovite redress ye?
Byron, Childe Harold, ii. 76.

II.† intrans. To rise again; reërect one's self.

Yet like the valiant Palme they did sustaine
Their peisant weight, redressing vp againe.
Hudson, tr. of Du Bartas's Judith, ii.

redress[1] (rē-dres′), n. [< OF. redresse, redresce, redrece, redress; from the verb: see redress[1], v.] 1†. A setting right again; a putting into proper order; amendment; reformation.

The redresse of boistrous & sturdie courages by perswasion. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 19.

The father, with sharpe rebukes sesoned with louing lookes, causeth a redresse and amendment in his childe.
Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 150.

For us the more necessary is a speedy redress of ourselves. Hooker.

2. Deliverance from wrong, injury, or oppression; removal of grievances or oppressive burdens; undoing of wrong; reparation; indemnification. In its most general sense redress includes whatever relief can be afforded against injustice, whether by putting an end to it, by compensation in damages, by punishing the wrong-doer, or otherwise.

Is not the swoord the most violent redress that may be used for any evill? Spenser, State of Ireland.

Be factious for redress of all these griefs.
Shak., J. C., i. 3. 118.

Fair majesty, the refuge and redress
Of those whom fate pursues and wants oppress.
Dryden, Æneid, i. 838.

Think not
But that there is redress where there is wrong,
So we are bold enough to seize it.
Shelley, The Cenci, iii. 1.

Ring in redress to all mankind.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cvi.

To every one o' my grievances law gave Redress. Browning, Ring and Book, I. 237.

=Syn. 2. Relief, amends, compensation.

redress[2] (rē-dres′), v. t. [< re- + dress.] To dress again, in any sense: as, to redress furniture or leather; to redress a wound.

redressal (rē-dres′al), n. [< redress[1] + -al.] The act of redressing. Imp. Dict.

redresser (rē-dres′ėr), n. One who gives redress.

Don Quixote of the Mancha, the righter of wrongs, the redresser of injuries.
Shelton, Don Quixote, iv. 25. (Latham.)

redressible (rē-dres′i-bl), a. [< redress[1] + -ible.] Capable of being redressed. Imp. Dict.

redressive (rē-dres′iv), a. [< redress[1] + -ive.] Affording redress; giving relief. [Rare.]

Can I forget the generous band
Who, touch'd with human woe, redressive search'd
Into the horrors of the gloomy jail?
Thomson, Winter, l. 360.

redressless (rē-dres′les), a. [< redress[1] + -less.] Without redress or amendment; without relief.

redressment (rē-dres′ment), n. [< OF. redrecement, redressement, F. redressement; as redress + -ment.] Redress; the act of redressing.

red-ribbon (red′rib″on), n. The band-fish.

redrive (rē-drīv′), v. t. [< re- + drive.] To drive back; drive again. Southey.

red-roan (red′rōn), a. See roan[1].

red-robin (red′rob″in), n. The red-rust, Puccinia graminis. [Eng.]

redroot (red′röt), n. 1. An American shrub, Ceanothus Americanus, the New Jersey tea. The stems are from 1 to 3 feet high from a dark-red root, the leaves ovate or oblong-ovate, the small white flowers gathered in rather pretty dense clusters at the ends of leafy shoots. The name is more or less extended to other members of the genus.

2. A herbaceous plant, Gyrotheca tinctoria, of the Hæmodoraceæ, or bloodwort family. It grows in wet sandy places in the eastern United States near the coast. It has a simple stem with sword-shaped leaves mostly from near the base, and woolly flowers, yellow within, crowded in a dense compound cyme. The root is red, and has been used in dyeing. Upon authority adduced by Darwin ("Origin of Species," ch. i.), the root of this plant is fatally poisonous to white pigs which eat it, but not to black; the statement, however, requires confirmation. Also paintroot.

3. The alkanet, Alkanna tinctoria.—4. One of the pigweeds, Amarantus retroflexus. [U. S.]

redruthite (red′röth-īt), n. [< Redruth, in Cornwall, England, + -ite[2].] Copper-glance: same as chalcocite.

redsear (red′sēr), v. i. [< red + sear (?).] To break or crack when too hot, as iron under the hammer: a word used by workmen. Also redshare.

red-seed (red′sēd), n. Small crustaceans, as ostracodes, copepods, etc., which float on the surface of the sea, and upon which mackerel, menhaden, etc., feed. Some red-seed is said to injure the fish.

red-shafted (red′shȧf″ted), a. Having red shafts of the wing- and tail-feathers: specifically applied to Colaptes mexicanus, the red-shafted woodpecker or Mexican flicker, related to the common flicker or yellow-shafted woodpecker. It abounds in western North America.

redshank (red′shangk), n. [< red[1] + shank.] 1. The fieldfare, Turdus pilaris. [Local, Eng.] —2. A wading bird of the family Scolopacidæ and genus Totanus, having red shanks. The common redshank is T. calidris, about 11 inches long, common in many parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa. The spotted redshank, T. fuscus, is a related species of similar distribution. Compare greenshank, yellowshank.

Redshank (Totanus calidris).

3. The hooded or black-headed gull, Chroïcocephalus ridibundus: so called from its red legs: more fully called redshank gull and red-legged gull or mew.—4. pl. A name given in contempt to Scottish Highlanders, and formerly to native Irish, in allusion to their dress leaving the legs exposed.

Mamertinus . . . dooth note the Redshanks and the Irish (which are properlie the Scots) to be the onlie enimies of our nation.
Harrison, Descrip. of Britain, p. 6 (Holinshed's Chron., I.).

And when the Redshanks on the borders by Incursions made, and rang'd in battell stood
To beare his charge, from field he made them flie,
Where fishie Moine [in Galway] did blush with crimson blood. Mir. for Mags. (England's Eliza, st. 105).

They lay upon the ground covered with skins, as the red-shanks do on heather. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 527.

Though all the Scottish hinds would not bear to be compared with those of the rich counties of South Britain, they would stand very well in competition with the peasants of France, Italy, and Savoy, not to mention the mountaineers of Wales, and the red-shanks of Ireland.
Smollett, Humphrey Clinker, ii. 41. (Davies.)

redshanks (red′shangks), n. 1. Same as herb-robert.—2. See Polygonum.

redshare (red′shâr), v. i. A variant of redsear.

red-short (red′shôrt), a. Noting iron or steel when it is of such a character that it is brittle at a red heat.

The former substance [sulphur] rendering the steel more or less brittle when hot (red-short or hot-short).
Encyc. Brit., XIII. 283.

red-shortness (red′shôrt″nes), n. In metal., the quality or state of being red-short.

Red-shortness is often the result of the presence of an undue proportion of sulphur in the metal.
W. H. Greenwood, Steel and Iron, p. 10.

The cold-shortness or red-shortness of iron or steel is due principally to an admixture of oxide of iron.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LX. 408.

red-shouldered (red′shōl″dėrd), a. Having the "shoulder"—that is, the carpal angle or bend of the wing—red, as a bird. The red-shouldered blackbird is Agelæus gubernator, common in western North America, where it replaces to some extent the common red-winged blackbird, from which it differs in having the scarlet patch on the wing not bordered with buff. The red-shouldered buzzard is Buteo lineatus, one of the commonest of the large hawks of the United States, having the lesser wing-coverts reddish when adult.—Red-shouldered falcon†, the adult red-shouldered buzzard.

red-sided (red′sī″ded), a. Having red on the sides: specifically noting the red-winged thrush, Turdus iliacus.

redsides (red′sīdz), n. A small cyprinoid fish, Notropis or Lythrurus ardens, common in the streams of the southern United States. Also called redfin.

redskin (red′skin), n. A Red Indian; a North American Indian.

The Virginia frontiersmen were angry with the Pennsylvania traders for selling rifles and powder to the redskins. The Atlantic, LXIV. 819.

red-spider (red′spī″dėr), n. A small red mite or acarine, Tetranychus telarius, formerly called Acarus telarius, now placed in the family Tetranychidæ: found in conservatories.

red-staff (red′stȧf), n. A millers' straight-edge, used in dressing millstones. The true edge, reddened by ocher, is gently rubbed on the stone, and the projecting points are thus detected, even when the irregularity of surface is very minute.

redstart (red′stärt), n. [< red[1] + start[2].] One of several entirely different birds which have the tail more or less red. (a) A small sylviine bird, Ruticilla phœnicura, of Europe, Asia, and Africa, related to the redbreast and bluethroat. Also firetail, redtail, etc. A similar species, R. titys or tithys, is known as the black redstart. (b) In the United States, a fly-catching warbler, Setophaga ruticilla, of the family Sylvicolidæ or Mniotiltidæ. The male is lustrous blue-black, with white belly and vent, the sides of the breast, the lining of the wings, and much of the extent of the wing- and tail-feathers fiery orange or flame-color, the bill and feet black. The female is mostly plain olivaceous, with the parts which are orange in the male clear pale yellow. The length is 5¼ inches, the extent 7¾. This beautiful bird abounds in woodland in eastern North America; it is migratory and insectivorous, has a singular song, builds a neat nest in the fork of a branch, and lays four or five eggs, which are white, speckled with shades of reddish brown.—Blue-throated redstart. Same as bluethroat.

redstreak (red′strēk), n. 1. A sort of apple, so called from the color of the skin.

The redstreak, of all cyder fruit, hath obtained the preference. Mortimer, Husbandry.

2. Cider pressed from redstreak apples.

Herefordshire redstreak made of rotten apples at the Three Cranes, true Brunswick Mum brew'd at S. Katherines. Character of a Coffee-house (1673), p. 3. (Hallivell.)

redtail (red′tāl), n. and a. I. n. 1. Same as redstart (a).—2. The red-tailed buzzard, Buteo borealis, one of the commonest and largest hawks of North America, when adult having the upper side of the tail bright chestnut-red. The plumage otherwise is very variable, not only with age, but also according to geographical distribution, there being several varieties or local races in western parts of the continent. It is commonly known as hen-hawk or chicken-hawk, and the young, without the red tail, is the white-breasted hawk. The male is from 19 to 22 inches long, and 48 inches or more in spread of wing; the female is 21 to 24 inches long, and spreads 56 inches. See cut under Buteo.

II. a. Having a red tail.

red-tape (red′tāp′), a. [< red tape: see tape.] Pertaining to or characterized by official routine or formality. See red tape, under tape.

Exposures by the press and criticisms in Parliament leave no one in ignorance of the vices of red-tape routine. H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 55.

We working men, when we do come out of the furnace, come out not tinsel and papier maché, like those fops of red-tape statesmen, but steel and granite. Kingsley, Alton Locke, iv. (Davies.) red-taped (red′tāpt′), a. [< red tape + -ed[2].] Same as red-tape. Nature, XLII. 106.

red-tapery (red′tā′pe-ri), n. [< red tape + -ery.] Same as red-tapism.

red-tapism (red′tā′pizm), n. [< red tape + -ism.] Strict observance of official formalities; a system of vexatious or tedious official routine.

He at once showed . . . how little he had of the official element which is best described as red-tapeism. T. W. Reid, Cabinet Portraits, p. 52.

He loudly denounces the Tchinovnik spirit—or, as we should say, red-tapeism in all its forms. D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 261.

red-tapist (red′tā′pist), n. [< red tape + -ist.] 1. A clerk in a public office. Quarterly Rev.—2. One who adheres strictly to forms and routine in official or other business.

You seem a smart young fellow, but you must throw over that stiff red-tapist of yours, and go with Public Opinion and Myself. Bulwer, My Novel, x. 20. (Davies.)

In no country is the red-tapist so out of place as here. Every calling is filled with bold, keen, subtle-witted men, fertile in expedients and devices, who are perpetually inventing new ways of buying cheaply, underselling, or attracting custom. W. Mathews, Getting on in the World, p. 99.

red-thighed (red′thīd), a. Having or characterized by red thighs.—Red-thighed locust. See locust[1].

red-throated (red′thrō″ted), a. Having a patch of red on the throat: as, the red-throated diver, Colymbus or Urinator septentrionalis.

red-thrush (red′thrush), n. The redwing, Turdus iliacus.

red-tipped (red′tipt), a. Having the wings tipped with red: as, the red-tipped clearwing, ★a British moth, Sesia formicæformis.

redtop (red′top), n. A kind of bent-grass, Agrostis alba. The species is common throughout the northern parts of the old world, and is thoroughly naturalized in America. It is marked to the eye by its large light panicle of minute spikelets on delicate branches, which is of a reddish hue. Some forms, called fiorin, white bent, etc., have a whitish top and a longer ligule. Redtop, at least in the United States, is a highly valued pasture-grass, and is also sown for hay. It forms a fine turf, and is suitable for lawns. Also called fine bent, fine-top-grass, and herd's-grass. [U. S.]—False redtop, the fowl meadow-grass, Poa flava, which has somewhat the aspect of redtop.—Northern or mountain redtop, Agrostis aperifolia, a species found from Wisconsin to the Pacific, allied to the common redtop, and giving promise of similar service in its own range.—Tall redtop, a tall reddish wiry grass, Tricuspis sesleriöides, found in the United States.

red-tubs (red′tubz), n. The sapphirine gurnard, Trigla hirundo. [Local, Eng.]

redub† (rē-dub′), v. t. [Early mod. E. also redoub; < OF. redouber, redauber (also radauber, radouber, F. radouber), repair, mend, fit, < re-, again, + douber (adouber), mend, repair, etc.: see dub[1].] To repair or make reparation for; make amends for; requite.

Whiche domage . . . neither with treasure ne with powar can be redoubed. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 14.

I doubte not by Goddes grace so honestly to redubbe all thynges that have been amys. Ellis, Literary Letters, p. 4.

O Gods, redubbe them vengeaunce iust. Phaer, Æneid, vi.

Whether they [monks] will conform themselves gladly, for the redubbing of their former trespasses, to go to other houses of their coat, where they shall be well received. State Papers, I. 540, in R. W. Dixon's Hist. Church of [Eng., vii., note.

redubber† (rē-dub′ėr), n. [Also redubbor; < OF. redoubeur*, radoubeur, one who mends or repairs a ship, < redouber, radouber, mend: see redub.] One who bought stolen cloth and so altered it in color or fashion that it could not be recognized.

reduce (rē-dūs′), v. t.; pret. and pp. reduced, ppr. reducing. [< ME. reducen, < OF. reducier, vernacularly reduire, F. réduire = Pr. reduzir, reduire = Cat. reduir = Sp. reducir = Pg. reduzir = It. ridurre, < L. reducere, lead or bring back, draw back, restore, replace, bring to a certain condition, reduce, < re-, back, + ducere, lead, bring: see duct. Cf. reduct, reduit, redout[2].] 1†. To lead or bring back; restore; resolve to a former state.

Therupon he reduced to their memorie the battailes they had fought. J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, iv.

Abate the edge of traitors, gracious Lord,
That would reduce these bloody days again.
Shak., Rich. III., v. 5. 36.

A good man will go a little out of his road to reduce the wandring traveller; but if he will not return, it will be an unreasonable compliance to go along with him to the end of his wandring. Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, II. iii. 19.

Mr. Cotton . . . did spend most of his time, both publicly and privately, to discover . . . errors, and to reduce such as were gone astray. Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 304.

And 'cause I see the truth of his affliction,
Which may be your's, or mine, or any body's,
Whose passions are neglected, I will try
My best skill to reduce him.
Shirley, Hyde Park, v. 1.

It were but right
And equal to reduce me to my dust.
Milton, P. L., x. 748.

2. In surg., to restore to its proper place, or so that the parts concerned are brought back to their normal topographical relations: as, to reduce a dislocation, fracture, or hernia.—3. To bring to any specified state, condition, or form: as, to reduce civil affairs to order; to reduce a man to poverty or despair; to reduce glass to powder; to reduce a theory to practice; to reduce a Latin phrase to English.

Being inspired with the holy spirite of God, they [the 72 Interpreters chosen by Eleazar out of each tribe] reduced out of Hebrue into Greeke all the partes of the olde Testament. Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 380.

Doe you then blame and finde faulte with soe good an Acte in that good pope as the reducing of such a greate people to Christianitye? Spenser, State of Ireland.

He had beene a peace-maker to reduce such and such, which were at oddes, to amitie. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 453.

Reduc'd to practice, his beloved rule
Would only prove him a consummate fool.
Cowper, Conversation, l. 139.

Holland was reduced to such a condition that peace was her first necessity. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., p. 463.

4. In metal. and chem., to bring into the metallic form; separate, as a metal, from the oxygen or other mineralizer with which it may be combined, or change from a higher to a lower degree of oxidation: as, to reduce the ores of silver or copper.—5†. To atone for; repair; redress.

Till they reduce the wrongs done to my father.
Marlowe.

6. To bring down; diminish in length, breadth, thickness, size, quantity, value, or the like: as, to reduce expenses; to reduce the quantity of meat in diet; to reduce the price of goods; to reduce the strength of spirit; to reduce a figure or design (to make a smaller copy of it without changing the form or proportion).

He likes your house, your housemaid, and your pay;
Reduce his wages, or get rid of her,
Tom quits you. Cowper, Truth, l. 211.

7. To bring to an inferior condition; weaken; impoverish; lower; degrade; impair in fortune, dignity, or strength: as, the family were in reduced circumstances; the patient was much reduced by hemorrhage.

Yet lo! in me what authors have to brag on!
Reduced at last to hiss in my own dragon.
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 286.

The Chamber encroached upon the sovereign, thwarted him, reduced him to a cypher, imprisoned him, and slew him. W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 2d ser., p. 93.

I dare say he was some poor musicianer, or singer, or a reduced gentleman, perhaps, for he always came after dusk, or else on bad, dark days. Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 331.

8. To subdue, as by force of arms; bring into subjection; render submissive: as, to reduce mutineers to submission; Spain, Gaul, and Britain were reduced by the Roman arms.

Charles marched northward at the head of a force sufficient, as it seemed, to reduce the Covenanters to submission. Macaulay, Nugent's Hampden.

Montpensier was now closely besieged, till at length, reduced by famine, he was compelled to capitulate. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 2.

The fortresses garrisoned by the French in Spain were reduced; but at what a prodigious expenditure of life was this effected! Encyc. Brit., IX. 457.

9. To bring into a class, order, genus, or species; bring within certain limits of definition or description.

I think it [analogy between words and reason] very worthy to be reduced into a science by itself. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 236.

Zanchius reduceth such infidels to four chief sects. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 598.

I shall . . . reduce these authors under their respective classes. Addison, Of the Christian Religion, § i. 1.

The variations of languages are reduced to rules. Johnson, Dict.

10. To show (a problem) to be merely a special case of one already solved.—11. To change the denomination of (numbers): as, to reduce a number of shillings to farthings, or conversely (see reduction (i)); change the form of (an algebraic expression) to one simpler or more convenient.—12. To prove the conclusion of (an indirect syllogism) from its premises by means of direct syllogism and immediate inference alone.—13. To adjust (an observed quantity) by subtracting from it effects due to the special time and place of observation, especially, in astronomy, by removing the effects of refraction, parallax, aberration, precession, and nutation, changing a circummeridian to a meridian altitude, and the like.—14. In Scots law, to set aside by an action at law; rescind or annul by legal means: as, to reduce a deed, writing, etc.—15. Milit., to take off the establishment and strike off the pay-roll, as a regiment. When a regiment is reduced, the officers are generally put upon half-pay.—Reduced eye, an ideal eye in which the two nodal points of the refractive system are considered as united into one, and also the two principal points: this simplifies the mathematical treatment of certain problems.—Reduced form of a complex, the form $r(\cos\phi + i\sin\phi)$, first used in 1828 by Cauchy.—Reduced hub. See hub, 7.—Reduced inertia of a machine. See inertia and machine.—Reduced iron, metallic iron in a fine powder, obtained by reducing ferric oxid by hydrogen at a dull-red heat. Also called powder of iron, iron-powder, iron by hydrogen.—Reduced latitude. Same as geocentric latitude (which see, under latitude).—Reduced reaction-time. See reaction-time.—Reducing flame, in blowpipe analysis. See flame, 1.—Reducing square. See square.—To reduce the square (milit.), to bring back a battalion which has been formed in a square to its former position in line or column. Farrow.—To reduce to the ranks (milit.), to degrade, for misconduct, to the condition of a private soldier.=Syn. 6. To lessen, decrease, abate, curtail, shorten, abridge, contract, retrench.

reduceable† (rē-dū′sa-bl), a. [= OF. reduisable; as reduce + -able. Cf. reducible.] Same as reducible.

They [young students] should be habituated to consider every excellence as reduceable to principles. Sir J. Reynolds, Discourses, I. viii.

reducement (rē-dūs′ment), n. [= Sp. reducimiento = It. riducimento; as reduce + -ment.] 1. The act of reducing; a bringing back; restoration.

This once select Nation of God . . . being ever since incapable of any Coalition or Reducement into one Body politic. Howell, Letters, ii. 8.

By this we shall know whether yours be that ancient Prelaty which you say was first constituted for the reducement of quiet and unanimity into the Church.
Milton, Church-Government, i. 6.

2. Reduction; abatement.

After a little reducement of his passion, and that time and further meditation had disposed his senses to their perfect estate.
History of Patient Grisel, p. 40. (Halliwell.) reducent (rē-dū′sent), a. and n. [< L. reducen(t-)s, ppr. of reducere: see reduce.] I. a. Tending to reduce.

★ II. n. That which reduces. Imp. Dict.

reducer (rē-dū′sėr), n. 1. One who or that which reduces, in any sense.

The last substances enumerated are those in general use as reducers or developers in photography.
Silver Sunbeam, p. 95.

An accumulator is indeed merely a chemical converter which is unequalled as a pressure-reducer.
Electric Rev. (Eng.), XXV. 583.

2. A joint-piece for connecting pipes of varying diameter. It may be of any form, straight, bent, etc. Also called reducing-coupling.

a, reducer, connecting the pipe of larger diameter b with the pipe of smaller diameter c.

reducibility (rē-dū-si-bil′i-ti), n. [< reducible + -ity (see -bility).] Reducibleness; reductibility.

The theorem of the reducibility of the general problem of transformation to the rational is, however, stated without proof in this paper.
Encyc. Brit., XIII. 70.

It was, however, quite evident, from . . . the history and the complete reducibility of the tumour, that it must be a pulmonary hernia.
Lancet, No. 3429, p. 1002.

reducible (rē-dū′si-bl), a. [< OF. redusible = Sp. reducible = Pg. reduzivel = It. riducibile; as reduce + -ible. Cf. reduceable.] Capable of being reduced; convertible.

In the new World they have a World of Drinks; for there is no Root, Flower, Fruit, or Pulse but is reducible to a notable Liquor.
Howell, Letters, ii. 54.

The line of its motion was neither straight nor yet reducible to any curve or mixed line that I had met with among mathematicians.
Boyle, Works, III. 683.

I have never been the less satisfied that no cause reducible to the known laws of nature occasioned my sufferings.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 198.

Reducible circuit. See circuit.—Reducible hernia, a hernia whose contents can be returned by pressure or posture.

reducibleness (rē-dū′si-bl-nes), n. The quality of being reducible.

The reducibleness of ice back again into water.
Boyle, Works, III. 50.

reducibly (rē-dū′si-bli), adv. In a reducible manner.

reducine (rē-dū′sin), n. [< reduce + *-ine*².] A decomposition product of urochrome.

reducing-coupling (rē-dū′sing-kup″ling), n. Same as reducer, 2.

reducing-press (rē-dū′sing-pres), n. An auxiliary press used in sheet-metal work to complete shapes that have been partially struck up.

reducing-scale (rē-dū′sing-skāl), n. A form of scale used by surveyors to reduce chains and links to acres and roods by inspection, and also in mapping and drawing to different scales; a surveying-scale.

reducing-T (rē-dū′sing-tē), n. A T-shaped pipe-coupling, having arms different from the stem in diameter of opening. It is used to unite pipes of different sections. Also written reducing-tee.

reducing-valve (rē-dū′sing-valv), n. In steam-engin., a peculiar valve controlled by forces acting in opposite directions. The parts are so arranged that the valve opens to its extreme limit only when the pressure on the delivery side is at a prescribed minimum, closing the part in the valve-seat more or less when this minimum is exceeded. The pressure on the delivery side of the valve is thus kept from varying (except between very narrow limits) from its predetermined pressure, although the pressure on the opposite side may be variable, and always higher than on the delivery side. Such valves are much used for maintaining lower pressures in steam-heating and -drying apparatus than is carried in the boiler. They are also used in automatic air-brakes for railways and in other pneumatic machines, and, in some forms, as gas-regulators for equalizing the pressure of gas delivered to gas-burners, etc. Also called pressure-reducing valve.

reduct† (rē-dukt′), v. t. [< L. reductus, pp. of reducere, lead or bring back: see reduce.] To reduce.

All the kynges host there beying assembled and reducte into one companye.
Hall, Edw. IV., an. 10.

Pray let me reduct some two or three shillings for points and ribands.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, iv. 5.

reduct (rē-dukt′), n. [< ML. reductus, a withdrawing-place: see *redout*².] In building, a little piece or cut taken out of a part, member, etc., to make it more uniform, or for any other purpose; a quirk. Gwilt.

reductibility (rē-duk-ti-bil′i-ti), n. [= F. réductibilité; as reduct + -ibility.] The quality of being reducible; reducibleness. Imp. Dict.

reductio ad absurdum (rē-duk′shi-ō ad ab-sėr′-dum). [L.: reductio, a leading, reduction; ad, to; absurdum, neut. of absurdus, absurd: see absurd.] A reduction to an absurdity; the proof of a proposition by proving the falsity of its contradictory opposite: an indirect demonstration. In geometry the reductio ad absurdum consists in drawing a figure whose parts are supposed to have certain relations, and then showing that this leads to a conclusion contrary to a known proposition, whence it follows that the parts of the figure cannot have those relations. Thus, in Euclid's "Elements" the proposition that if a triangle has two angles equal the sides opposite those angles will be equal is proved as follows. In the triangle ABC, let the angles ABC and ACB be equal. Then, suppose AB to be greater than AC. Lay off BD = AC and join DC. Then, comparing the two triangles ACB and DBC, we have in the former the sides AC and BC and their included angle ACB equal in the latter to the sides DB and CB and their included angle DBC. Hence, these two triangles would be equal, or the part would be equal to the whole. This proof is a reductio ad absurdum. This kind of reasoning is considered somewhat objectionable as not showing the principle from which the proposition flows; but it is a perfectly conclusive mode of proof, and, in fact, is in all cases readily converted into a direct proof. Thus, in the above example, we have only to compare the triangle ABC with itself, considering it as two triangles according as the angle B is named before C or vice versa. In the triangle ABC the angles B and C with the included side BC are respectively equal in the triangle ACB to the angles C and B with the included side CB; hence the other parts of the triangles are equal, and the side AC opposite the first angle B in the first triangle is equal to the side AB opposite the first angle C in the second triangle.

★reduction (rē-duk′shon), n. [< OF. reduction, F. réduction = Pr. reductio = Sp. reducción = Pg. reducção = It. riduzione, < L. reductio(n-), a leading or bringing back, a restoring, restoration, < reducere, lead or bring back: see reduce, reduct.] The act of reducing, or the state of being reduced. (a†) The act of bringing back or restoring.

For reduction of your majesty's realm of Ireland to the unity of the Church.
Bp. Burnet, Records, II. ii.

(b) Conversion into another state or form: as, the reduction of a body to powder; the reduction of things to order. (c) Diminution: as, the reduction of the expenses of government; the reduction of the national debt; a reduction of 25 per cent. made to wholesale buyers.

Let him therefore first make the proper reduction in the account, and then see what it amounts to.
Waterland, Works, VI. 186.

(d) Conquest; subjugation: as, the reduction of a province under the power of a foreign nation; the reduction of a fortress. (e) A settlement or parish of South American Indians converted and trained by the Jesuits.

Governing and civilizing the natives of Brazil and Paraguay in the missions and reductions, or ministering, at the hourly risk of his life, to his coreligionists in England under Elizabeth and James I., the Jesuit appears alike devoted, indefatigable, cheerful, and worthy of hearty admiration and respect.
Encyc. Brit., XIII. 649.

The Indians [under the Jesuits in Paraguay] were gathered into towns or communal villages called bourgaden or reductions, where they were taught the common arts, agriculture, and the practice of rearing cattle.
Johns Hopkins Univ. Studies, 8th ser., IV. 32.

(f) The bringing of a problem to depend on a problem already solved. (g) The transformation of an algebraic expression into another of a simpler kind. (h) The lowering of the values of the numerator and denominator of a fraction, or of the antecedent and consequent of a ratio, by dividing both by the same quantity. (i) The conversion of a quantity expressed in terms of one denomination so as to express it in terms of another denomination. Ascending reduction is conversion to terms of larger units; descending reduction, conversion to terms of smaller units. (j) The proof of the conclusion of an indirect syllogism from its premises by means of a direct syllogism and immediate inferences. This is said to be a reduction to the mode of direct syllogism employed. (k) A direct syllogism proving, by means of conversions and other immediate inferences, that the conclusion of an indirect syllogism follows from its premises. (l) The act or process of making a copy of a figure, map, design, draft, etc., on a smaller scale, preserving the original proportions; also, the result of this process. (m) In surg., the operation of restoring a dislocated or fractured bone to its former place. (n) Separation of a metal from substances combined with it: used especially with reference to lead, zinc, and copper, and also applied to the treatment of iron ore, as when steel is made from it by a direct process. (o) In astron., the correction of observed quantities for instrumental errors, as well as for refraction, parallax, aberration, precession, and nutation, so as to bring out their actual value. A similar process is commonly applied to observations in other physical sciences. (p) In Scots law, an action for setting aside a deed, writing, etc.—Apagogical reduction, in logic, a reduction in which the contradictory of the conclusion becomes one of the premises, and the contradictory of one of the premises the conclusion. Apagogical reduction is an application of the reductio ad absurdum, and is also called reductio per impossibile. Example:

Baroco.	Reductio per impossibile.
All M is P.	All M is P.
Some S is not P.	All S is M.
Ergo, Some S is not M.	Ergo, All S is P.

Chasles-Zeuthen reduction, a method of finding how many figures fulfil certain conditions, by the consideration of degenerate figures composed of simpler figures with lower constants. Thus, in this way we readily find that the number of conics touching five given conics in a plane is 3,264.—Iron-reduction process. See process.—Long reduction, in logic, a reduction in which the major premise of the original syllogism becomes the minor premise, and vice versa, and in which one of the premises and the conclusion are converted. Example:

Camestres.	Long Reduction.
All M is P.	No P is S.
No S is P.	All M is P.
Ergo, No S is M.	Ergo, No M is S

Ostensive reduction, that reduction which has for its premises the original premises or their conversions, and for its conclusion the original conclusion or its converse.—Reduction and reduction-improbation, in Scots law, the designations given to the two varieties of rescissory actions. See improbation, 2.—Reduction reductive, an action in which a decree of reduction which has been erroneously or improperly obtained is sought to be reduced.—Reduction to the ecliptic, the difference between the anomaly of a planet reckoned from its node and the longitude reckoned from the same point.—Short reduction, in logic, a reduction which differs from the original syllogism only in having one of its premises converted. The following is an example:

Cesare.	Short Reduction.
No M is P.	No P is M.
All S is P.	All S is P.
Ergo, No S is M.	Ergo, No S is M.

=Syn. (e) Lessening, decrease, abatement, curtailment, abridgment, contraction, retrenchment.

reduction-compasses (rē-duk′shon-kum″pas-ez), n. pl. Proportional dividers, or whole-and-half dividers.

reduction-formula (rē-duk′shon-fôr″mū-lä), n. In the integral calculus, a formula depending on integration by parts, reducing an integral to another nearer to one of the standard forms.

reduction-works (rē-duk′shon-wėrks), n. sing. and pl. A metallurgical establishment; smelting-works.

reductive (rē-duk′tiv), a. and n. [= F. réductif = Sp. Pg. reductivo = It. riduttivo, < L. reductus, pp. of reducere, lead or bring back: see reduct, reduce.] I. a. Having the property, power, or effect of reducing; tending to reduce.

Inquire into the repentance of thy former life particularly; whether it were of a great and perfect grief, and productive of fixed resolutions of holy living, and reductive of these to act.
Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, iv. 6.

Reduction reductive. See reduction.—Reductive conversion, in logic, a conversion of a proposition in which there is some modification of the subject or predicate: as, no man is a mother, therefore no mother is some man. See conversion, 2.—Reductive principle, a principle by which an indirect syllogism is reduced to a direct mood. The reductive principles were said to be conversion, transposition, and reductio per impossibile.

II. n. That which has the power of reducing.

So that it should seem there needed no other reductive of the numbers of men to an equability than the wars that have happened in the world.
Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 215.

reductively (rē-duk′tiv-li), adv. By reduction; by consequence.

Love, and simplicity, and humility, and usefulness: . . . I think these do reductively contain all that is excellent in the whole conjugation of Christian graces.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 44.

reduit†, n. See *redout*².

redundance (rē-dun′dans), n. [< OF. redondance, F. redondance, rédondance = Sp. Pg. redundancia = It. ridondanza, < L. redundantia, an overflow, superfluity, excess, < redundan(t-)s, redundant: see redundant.] 1. The character of being redundant; superfluity; superabundance.

He is a poor unwieldy wretch that commits faults out of the redundance of his good qualities.
Steele, Tatler, No. 27.

2. That which is redundant or in excess; anything superfluous.

redundancy (rē-dun′dan-si), n. [As redundance (see -cy).] Same as redundance.

The mere
Redundancy of youth's contentedness.
Wordsworth, Prelude, vi.

=Syn. Verbosity, Tautology, etc. (see pleonasm); surplusage.

★redundant (rē-dun′dant), a. [< OF. redondant, F. redondant, rédondant = Sp. Pg. redundante = It. ridondante, < L. redundan(t-)s, ppr. of redundare, overflow, redound: see redound.] 1†. Rolling or flowing back, as a wave or surge.

On his rear,
Circular base of rising folds, that tower'd
Fold above fold, a surging maze! his head . . .
Amidst his circling spires, that on the grass
Floated redundant.
Milton, P. L., ix. 503.

2. Superfluous; exceeding what is natural or necessary; superabundant; exuberant.

Notwithstanding the redundant oil in fishes, they do not increase fat so much as flesh. Arbuthnot, Aliments, iv. 1.

With foliage of such dark redundant growth.
Cowper, Task, i. 226.

A farmer's daughter, with redundant health.
Crabbe, Works, VIII. 216.

3. Using or containing more words or images than are necessary or useful: as, a redundant style.

Where the author is redundant, mark those paragraphs to be retrenched. Watts.

Redundant chord or interval, in music, same as augmented chord or interval—that is, one greater by a half-step than the corresponding major chord or interval. Also pluperfect, extreme, superfluous chord or interval. So redundant fourth, fifth, sixth, etc.—Redundant hyperbola, a curve having three or more asymptotes.—Redundant number, a number the sum of whose divisors exceeds the number itself.

redundantly (rē-dun′dant-li), adv. In a redundant manner; with superfluity or excess; superfluously; superabundantly.

red-underwing (red′un″dėr-wing), n. A large British moth, Catocala nupta, expanding three inches, having the under wings red bordered with black. See underwing.

reduplicate (rē-dū′pli-kāt), v. [< ML. (LL. in derived noun) reduplicatus, pp. of reduplicare (> It. reduplicare = Sp. Pg. reduplicar), redouble, < L. re-, again, + duplicare, double, duplicate: see duplicate. Cf. redouble.] I. trans. 1. To double again; multiply; repeat.

That reduplicated advice of our Saviour.
Bp. Pearson, Expos. of Creed, xii.

Then followed that ringing and reduplicated laugh of his, so like the joyous bark of a dog when he starts for a ramble with his master.
Lowell, The Century, XXXV. 514.

2. In philol., to repeat, as a syllable or the initial part of a syllable (usually a root-syllable). See reduplication.

II. intrans. In philol., to be doubled or repeated; undergo reduplication: as, reduplicating verbs.

reduplicate (rē-dū′pli-kāt), a. [= F. réduplqué = Sp. Pg. reduplicado = It. reduplicato, < ML. reduplicatus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. Redoubled; repeated; reduplicative.

Reduplicate words are formed of repetitions of sound, as in murmur, singsong. S. S. Haldeman, Etymology, p. 23.

2. In bot.: (a) Valvate, with the edges folded back so as to project outward: said of petals and sepals in one form of estivation. (b) Describing an estivation so characterized. Also ★reduplicative.

reduplication (rē-dū-pli-kā′shon), n. [= F. réduplication = Sp. reduplicación = Pg. reduplicação = It. reduplicazione, < L. reduplicatio(n-), < (ML.) reduplicare, redouble, reduplicate: see reduplicate.] 1. The act of reduplicating, redoubling, or repeating, or the state of being reduplicated.

Jesus, by reduplication of his desire, fortifying it with a command, made it in the Baptist to become a duty.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 97.

The memory-train is liable to change in two respects, which considerably modify its structure: viz., (1) through the evanescence of some parts, and (2) through the partial recurrence of like impressions, which produces reduplications of varying amount and extent in other parts.
J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 61.

2. In rhet., a figure in which a verse ends with the same word with which the following begins. —3. In philol.: (a) The repetition of a syllable (usually a root-syllable), or of the initial part, often with more or less modification, and in various processes of word-formation and inflection. In our languages, it is especially the perfect tense that exhibits reduplication: thus, Gothic haihald, Latin cecini, Greek πέφευγα, Sanskrit babhāra; but also the present tense: thus, Latin sisto, Greek δίδωμι, Sanskrit dadāmi, etc.; and elsewhere. (b) The new syllable formed by reduplication. —4. In logic, an expression affixed to the subject of a proposition, showing the formal cause of its possession of the predicate: as, "man, as an animal, has a stomach," where the expression "as an animal" is the reduplication. —5. In anat. and zoöl., a folding of a part; a folded part; a fold or duplication, as of a membrane, of the skin, etc. Also reduplicature.—Attic reduplication, in Gr. gram., reduplication in the perfect of some verbs beginning with α, ε, ο, by prefixing the first two letters of the stem to the same letters with temporal augment: as ἀλήλιφα from ἀλείφω, ἀκήκοα from ἀκούω. A similar reduplication is found in the second aorist (ἤγαγον from ἄγω) and in the present (ἀραρίσκω). This reduplication did not especially characterize the Attic as distinguished from contemporary dialects, but was called Attic by late grammarians as opposed to the less classic form used in their own days.

reduplicative (rē-dū′pli-kā-tiv), a. [< F. réduplicatif = Sp. Pg. reduplicativo = It. reduplicativo, < ML. reduplicativus, < ML. reduplicare, reduplicate: see reduplicate.] 1. Containing or effecting reduplication, in any sense.

Some logicians refer reduplicative propositions to this place, as "Men, considered as men, are rational creatures"—that is, because they are men. Watts, Logic, ii. 2.

2. In bot., same as reduplicate, 2.

reduplicature (rē-dū′pli-kā-ṭūr), n. [< reduplicate + -ure.] Same as reduplication, 5. [Rare.]

The body [in Phyllopoda] is either cylindrically elongated and clearly segmented, without free reduplicature of the skin, e. g. Branchipus, or it may be covered by a broad and flattened shield. Claus, Zoology (trans.), p. 416.

Reduviidæ (red-ū-vī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Stephens, 1829), < Reduvius + -idæ.] An important family of predaceous bugs, named from the genus Reduvius. They have the thoracic segments concentrated, the coxæ short, two ocelli, four-jointed antennæ, a three-jointed rostrum, three-jointed tarsi, and long strong legs, of which the anterior are sometimes prehensile. It is a large and wide-spread family, containing a great variety of forms grouped into nine subfamilies and many genera. Throughout their life they are predaceous and feed on other insects. A very few species, like Conorhinus sanguisugus, suck the blood of warm-blooded animals. See also cuts under Conorhinus, Harpactor, Pirates, and Reduvius.

reduvioid (rē-dū′vi-oid), a. and n. [< Reduvius + -oid.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Reduviidæ; resembling a reduviid.

II. n. A member of the family Reduviidæ.

Reduvius (rē-dū′vi-us), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1776), < L. reduvia, a hangnail.] A genus of heteropterous insects, typical of the family Reduviidæ, formerly of very large extent, but now restricted to species which have the postocular section of the head longer than the anteocular section, and the first joint of the head scarcely shorter than the second. About 50 species are now included, most of them African. A few are European, and one only is found in America. R. personatus is a European species, an inch long, known as the fly-bug, of a dark-brown color with reddish legs.

Reduvius personatus.

redux (rē′duks), a. [L., that leads or brings back, also led or brought back, < reducere, lead or bring back: see reduce.] 1. Led or brought back, as from a distance, from captivity, etc.: as, "Astræa Redux" (the title of a poem by Dryden on the restoration and return of Charles II.).

Lady Laura Standish is the best character in "Phineas Finn" and its sequel "Phineas Redux."
Trollope, Autobiog., xvii.

2. In med., noting the return of certain physical signs, after their disappearance in consequence of disease.

redware (red′wâr), n. A seaweed, Laminaria digitata, the common tangle.

red-wat (red′wot′), a. [< red[1] + wat, a Sc. form of wet: see wet.] Wetted by something red, as blood. [Scotch.]

The hand of her kindred has been red-wat in the heart's blude o' my name; but my heart says, Let byganes be byganes. Blackwood's Mag., VII. 384.

★redwater (red′wâ″tėr), n. A disease of cattle, also called hemoglobinuria, or hemoglobinemia, because the coloring matter (hemoglobin) of the red blood-corpuscles which have been broken up in the system appears in the urine, and imparts to it a pale-red or a dark-red, port-wine color. The disease prevails in various countries in undrained, unimproved meadows and in woods, whence it is also called wood-evil. Redwater is a prominent symptom of Texas cattle-fever, in which it is due to destruction of the red blood-corpuscles, with consequent liberation of the hemoglobin, by the protozoan parasite of this disease. See Texas fever. It is rarely observed among sheep and swine.

red-water tree (red′wâ″tėr trē). The sassy-bark tree, Erythrophleum Guineense.

redweed (red′wēd), n. 1. The corn-poppy, Papaver Rhœas, whose red petals have been used as a dye. Also applied locally to various reddish-stemmed plants. [Eng.] —2. A species of Phytolacca, or pokeweed. [West Indies.]

red-whelk (red′hwelk), n. A whelk, Chrysodomus antiquus. See cut under reversed. [Local, Eng.]

red-whiskered (red′hwis″kėrd), a. Having red whiskers: applied in ornithology to several birds: as, the red-whiskered bulbul, Otocompsa ★jocosa of India.

redwing (red′wing), n. 1. The red-winged thrush of Europe, Turdus iliacus. —2. The red-winged marsh-blackbird of America, Agelæus phœniceus. See Agelæus and blackbird.

red-winged (red′wingd), a. Having red wings, or red on the wings.

red-withe (red′with), n. A high-climbing vine of tropical America, Combretum Jacquini. ★[West Indies.]

redwood (red′wůd), n. 1. The most valuable of Californian timber-trees, Sequoia sempervirens, or its wood. It occupies the Coast ranges, where exposed to ocean fogs, from the northern limit of the State to the southern borders of Monterey county, but is most abundant north of San Francisco. It is the only congener of the famous big or mammoth tree, which it almost rivals in size. It grows commonly from 200 to 300 feet high, with a straight cylindrical trunk, naked to the height of 70 or Branch with Cones of Redwood (Sequoia sempervirens).

a, a cone; b, a seed.

100 feet; the diameter is from 8 to 12 feet. The bark is from 6 to 12 inches thick, of a bright cinnamon color; the wood is of a rich brownish red, light, straight-grained, easily worked and taking a fine finish, and very durable in contact with the soil. Its wood is widely used as building-timber on the Pacific coast of the United States; in California it is used almost exclusively for shingles, fence-posts, railway-ties, telegraph-poles, wine-butts, etc.

2. The name is also applied to various other trees. Thus, the East Indian redwoods are Soymida febrifuga, also called East Indian mahogany; Pterocarpus santalinus, the red sandalwood (see sandalwood); and P. Indicus, the Andaman redwood, or padouk. The last is a lofty tree of India, Burma, the Andaman Islands, etc., with the heart-wood dark-red, close-grained, and moderately hard, used to make furniture, gun-carriages, carts, and for many other purposes. Other trees called redwood are Cornus mas, of Europe and Asia Minor; Rhamnus Erythroxylum, the Siberian buckthorn; Trochetia Erythroxylon of the Sterculiaceæ, an almost extinct tree of St. Helena; the Jamaican Hæmocharis Hæmatoxylon, of the Theaceæ; Colubrina Colubrina, a rhamnaceous tree of the West Indies and Florida; Diporidium arboreum, of the Cape of Good Hope; Ceanothus spinosus, a shrub or small tree of southern California; and any tree of the genus Erythroxylum. Redwood is also a local name of the Scotch pine. See pine[1].

red-wood (red′wůd), a. [Also red-wud; < red[1] intensive (cf. red-mad, etc.) + wood[2], mad: see wood[2].] Stark mad. [Scotch.]

An' now she 's like to rin red-wud
About her Whisky.
Burns, Prayer to the Scotch Representatives.

ree[1] (rē), v. t. [Also rie; supposed to be a dial. reduction of riddle[2].] To riddle; sift; separate or throw off. [Prov. Eng.]

After malt is well rubbed and winnowed, you must then ree it over in a sieve. Mortimer, Husbandry.

ree[2] (rē), a. [< ME. ree*, reh, < AS. hreóh, hrióh, contr. hreó, fierce, wild, stormy, troubled, = OS. hrē, wild.] 1. Wild; outrageous; crazy. [Prov. Eng.] —2. Half-drunk; tipsy. [Prov. Eng.]

ree[2] (rē), n. [Cf. ree[2], a.] A state of temporary delirium. [Prov. Eng.]

ree[3] (rē), n. [Origin obscure.] A river; a flood. [Prov. Eng.]

ree[4] (rē), interj. A reduction (as an exclamation) of reet, dialectal form of right: used in driving horses.

reebok (rā′bok), n. [< D. reebok = E. roebuck: see roebuck.] A South African antelope, Pelea capreola: so called by the Dutch colonists. The horns are smooth, long, straight, and slender, and so sharp at the point that the Hottentots and Bushmen use them for needles and bodkins. The reebok is nearly 5 feet in length, 2½ feet high at the shoulder, of a slighter and more graceful form than most other antelopes, and extremely swift. Also reh-bok and rheebok.

reecht, n. [< ME. reche, reech, an assibilated form of reek, smoke: see reek[1].] Smoke.

Such a rothun of a reche ros.
Alliterative Poems (E. E. T. S.), ii. 1009.

reechily†, adv. [< reechy + *-ly*2.] Smokily; squalidly.

And wash his face, he lookt so reechilie,
Like bacon hanging on the chimnie roofe.
D. Belchier, See me and See me not, sig. C. 2 b. (Nares.) reëcho (rē-ek'ō), v. [Early mod. E. re-eccho; < re- + echo.] I. intrans. To echo back; sound back or reverberate again.

A charge of snuff the wily virgin threw; . . .
And the high dome re-echoes to his nose.
Pope, R. of the L., v. 86.

II. trans. To echo back; return; send back; repeat; reverberate again: as, the hills reëcho the roar of cannon.

The consecrated roof
Re-echoing pious anthems! Cowper, Task, i. 343.

reëcho (rē-ek'ō), n. [< reëcho, v.] The echo of an echo; a second or repeated echo.

The hills and vallies here and there resound
With the re-echoes of the deepe-mouth'd hound.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, i. 4.

reechy† (rē'chi), a. [An assibilated form of reeky.] Tarnished with smoke; sooty; foul; squalid; filthy.

The kitchen malkin pins
Her richest lockram 'bout her reechy neck.
Shak., Cor., ii. 1. 225.

★reed1 (rēd), n. [< ME. reed, red, reod, irreg. rehed, reheed, < AS. hreód = OD. ried, D. riet = MLG. rēt, LG. ried=OHG. hriot, riot, MHG. riet, G. ried, riet, a reed; root unknown.] 1. Any tall broad-leafed grass growing on the margins of streams or in other wet places; especially, any grass of one of the genera Trichoon, Arundo, or Ammophila. The common reed is Trichoon Phragmites, a stately grass from five to twelve feet high, found in nearly all parts of the world. It serves by its creeping rootstocks to fix alluvial banks; its stems form perhaps the most durable thatch, and are otherwise useful; and it is planted for ornament. See the generic names, and phrases below. Compare reed-grass.

Common Reed (Trichoon Phragmites).
1, flowering plant; 2, the panicle; a, a spikelet.

He lieth under the shady trees, in the covert of the reed, and fens. Job xl. 21.

We glided winding under ranks
Of iris, and the golden reed.
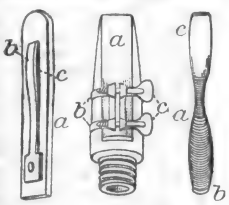
Tennyson, In Memoriam, ciii.



2. Some one of other more or less similar plants. See phrases below.—3. A musical pipe of reed or cane, having a mouthpiece made by slitting the tube near a joint, and usually several finger-holes; a rustic or pastoral pipe; hence, figuratively, pastoral poetry. See cut under *pipe*1.

I'll . . . speak between the change of man and boy
With a reed voice. Shak., M. of V., iii. 4. 67.

Sound of pastoral reed with oaten stops.
Milton, Comus, l. 345.

Now she tries the Reed, anon attempts the Lyre.
Congreve, Epistle to Lord Halifax.

4. In music: (a) In musical instruments of the oboe and clarinet classes, and in all kinds of organs, a thin elastic plate or tongue of reed, wood, or metal, so fitted to an opening into a pipe as nearly to close it, and so arranged that, when a current of air is directed through the opening, the reed is drawn into or driven against it so as to close it, but immediately springs back by its own elasticity, only to be pressed forward again by the air, thus producing a tone, either directly by its own vibrations or indirectly by the sympathetic vibrations of the column of air in the pipe. When the reed is of metal, the pitch of the tone depends chiefly on its size; but when of reed or cane, it may be so combined with a tube that the pitch shall depend chiefly on the size of the air-column. A free reed is one that vibrates in the opening without touching its edges; a beating or striking reed is one that extends slightly beyond the opening. In orchestral instruments, the wood wind group includes several reed-instruments, which have either double reeds (two wooden reeds which strike against each other, as in the oboe, the bassoon, the English horn, etc.), or a single reed (a wooden reed striking against an opening in a wooden mouthpiece or beak, as in the clarinet, the basset-horn, etc.). A pipe-organ usually contains one or more sets of reed-pipes, the tongues of which are nearly always striking reeds of brass. (See reed-pipe.) A reed-organ is properly a collection of several sets of reeds, the tongues of which are free reeds of brass. (See reed-organ.) In the brass wind group of instruments, with but few exceptions, the tone is produced by the player's lips acting as free membranous reeds within the cup of the mouthpiece. The mechanism of the human voice, also, is essentially a reed-instrument, the vocal cords being simply free membranous reeds which may be stretched within the tube of the larynx. The quality of the tone produced by a reed varies indefinitely, according to the material and character of the reed itself, the method in which it is set in vibration, and especially the arrangement of the tube or cavity with which it is connected. The accompanying fig. 1 shows the construction of an organ-reed: a is the reed-block, which in use is inserted in its proper slot in the reed-board; b, the metal tongue, which is set in sonorous vibration when air is forced through the opening c. Fig. 2 shows the mouthpiece of a clarinet, in which a is the reed, held to the body of the mouthpiece by the split-bands b, which are drawn tight by the screws c. Air entering between the reed and the margin of an opening which it covers causes it to produce a musical tone, the pitch of which is varied partly by the position of the mouthpiece in the mouth and partly by the action of the keys. Fig. 3 shows the mouthpiece of an oboe, and similar reeds are used for bassoons and bagpipes. The reed is made of two counterparts of the same shape bound together by the thread a. The lower and middle parts of the mouthpiece are circular in cross-section, but the upper part c, the reed proper, is flattened. Air forced through this opening causes the reed to emit a harsh tone, which is softened in quality by the tube of the instrument. (b) In reed-instruments of the oboe class, and in both pipe- and reed-organs, the entire mechanism immediately surrounding the reed proper, consisting of the tube or box the opening or eschallot of which the reed itself covers or fills, together with any other attachments, like the tuning-wire of reed-pipes. (See reed-organ and reed-pipe.) In the clarinet the analogous part is called the beak or mouthpiece. (c) Any reed-instrument as a whole, like an oboe or a clarinet: as, the reeds of an orchestra. (d) In organ-building, same as reed-stop.—5. A missile weapon; an arrow or a javelin: used poetically.

Reeds.

With cruel Skill the backward Reed
He sent, and, as he fled, he slew.
Prior, To a Lady, st. 8.

The viewless arrows of his thoughts were headed
And wing'd with flame,
Like Indian reeds blown from his silver tongue.
Tennyson, The Poet.

6. Reeds or straw prepared for thatching; thatch: a general term: as, a bundle of reed.—7. A long slender elastic rod of whalebone, ratan, or steel, of which several are inserted in a woman's skirt to expand or stiffen it.—8. In mining, any hollow plant-stem which can be filled with powder and put into the cavity left by the withdrawal of the needle, to set off the charge at the bottom. Such devices are nearly or entirely superseded by the safety-fuse. Also called spire.—9. An instrument used for pressing down the threads of the woof in tapestry, so as to keep the surface well together.—10. A weavers' instrument for separating the threads of the warp, and for beating the weft up to the web. It is made of parallel slips of metal or reed, called dents, which resemble the teeth of a comb. The dents are fixed at their ends into two parallel pieces of wood set a few inches apart.

The reed for weaving the same is measured in an equally complex manner, for the unit of length is 37 inches, and according to the number of hundreds of dents or splits it contains, so is the reed called. For instance, a "fourteen-hundred reed" means that 37 inches of a reed of that number, no matter what length, contains 1400 dents, or about 38 per inch. A. Barlow, Weaving, p. 329.

11. In her., a bearing representing a weavers' reed. See *slay*2.—12. A Hebrew and Assyrian unit of length, equal to 6 cubits, generally taken as being from 124 to 130 inches.

A measuring reed of six cubits long, of a cubit and a handbreadth each. Ezek. xl. 5.

13. Same as rennet-bag. W. B. Carpenter.—14. In arch., carp., etc., a small convex molding; in the plural, same as reeding, 2.

The three pillars [of the temple] which stand together are fluted; and the lower part, filled with cablins of reeds, is of one stone, and the upper part of another.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 169.

Canary reed, the reed canary-grass. See Phalaris.—Dutch reeds, in the arts, the stems of several kinds of horsetail or scouring-rush (Equisetum) used, on account of their silicious crust, to polish wood and even metals.—Egyptian reed, the papyrus.—Fly-reed, in weaving, a reed of a fly-shuttle loom, provided with springs which limit the force with which the reed strikes the weft-thread to a constant or very nearly a constant quantity, and thus produce a greater uniformity of texture.—Great reed, a reed of the genus Arundo, especially Arundo Donax.—Harmonic reed. See harmonic.—Indian reed, the canna or Indian-shot.—New Zealand reed, a fine ornamental grass, Arundo conspicua, blooming earlier than pampas-grass.—Number of the reed, set of the reed, in weaving. See number.—Paper reed. See paper-reed.—Reed bent. See *bent*2.—Reed bent-grass. Same as small reed (which see, below).—Reed meadow-grass. See meadow-grass.—Reed of hemp. Same as *boon*2.—Sea-reed, or sea-sand reed, the marram or mat-grass, Ammophila arenaria.—Small reed, any species of Calamagrostis or of Deyeuxia, including the useful blue-joint grass.—Trumpet-reed, Trichoon Phragmites, of tropical America (West Indies).—Wood-reed, writing-reed, Calamagrostis Epigejos, of the northern parts of the old world.

★reed1 (rēd), v. t. [< ME. reeden; < *reed*1, n.] 1. To thatch. Compare *reed*1, n., 6.

Where houses be reeded,
Now pare of the moss, and go beat in the reed.
Tusser, Husbandry.

2. In carp., arch., etc., to fashion into, or decorate with, reeds or reeding.

reed2†, a. An obsolete form of *red*1 (still extant in the surname Reed).

reed3†, v. and n. An obsolete form of *read*1.

reedbeere†, n. [< *reed*1 + beer as in pillow-beer, etc.] A bed of reeds.

A place where reedes grow: a reedebeere.
Nomenclator. (Nares.)

reed-bird (rēd'bėrd), n. 1. The bobolink, Dolichonyx oryzivorus: so called in the late summer and early fall months, when the male has exchanged his black-and-buff dress for a plain yellowish streaked plumage like that of the female, and when it throngs the marshes in great flocks, becomes very fat, and is highly esteemed for the table. The name reed-bird obtains chiefly in the Middle States, where the birds haunt the fields of water-oats or wild rice (Zizania aquatica); further south, where it similarly throngs the rice-fields, it is called rice-bird. It is known as butter-bird in the West Indies, and is also called ortolan. See bobolink, Dolichonyx, ortolan.

2. A reed-warbler.

reedbuck (rēd'buk), n. [Tr. D. rietbok.] A name of several kinds of aquatic African antelopes; specifically, Eleotragus arundinaceus. Also rietbok.

reed-bunting (rēd'bun″ting), n. The black-headed bunting, Emberiza schœniclus. It is a common bird of Europe, frequenting the reeds of marshes and fens, and is about six inches long. Also called reed-sparrow.

reeden† (rē'dn), a. [< *reed*1 + *-en*2.] Consisting of a reed or reeds; made of reeds.

Through reeden pipes convey the golden flood,
T' invite the people [bees] to their wonted food.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv. 385.

reeder (rē'dėr), n. [< ME. redere*, redare; < *reed*1 + *-er*1.] 1. One who thatches with reeds; a thatcher. Prompt. Parv., p. 426.—2. A thatched frame covering blocks or tiles of dried china-clay, to protect them from the rain while permitting free ventilation.

A number of thatched gates or reeders.
Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 637.

reed-goundt, n. See redgound.

reed-grass (rēd'gràs), n. [= D. rietgras = G. ★riet- (ried-) gras; as *reed*1 + grass.] 1†. The bur-reed, Sparganium ramosum.—2. Any one of the grasses called reeds, and some others, commonly smaller, of similar habit. See phrases.—Salt reed-grass, Spartina polystachya, a tall stout salt-marsh grass with a dense oblong purplish raceme, found along the Atlantic coast of the United States.—Small reed-grass. Same as small reed (which see, under *reed*1).—Wood reed-grass, either of the two species of Cinna, C. arundinacea and C. latifolia, northern grasses in America, the latter also in Europe. They are graceful sweet-scented woodland grasses, apparently of no great value.

reëdification† (rē-ed″i-fi-kā'shon), n. [= OF. reedification, F. réédification = Sp. reedificación = Pg. reedificação = It. riedificazione; as re- + edification.] The act or operation of rebuilding, or the state of being rebuilt.

The toun was compellid to help to the Reedification of it.
Leland, Itinerary (1789), III. 11.

reëdify† (rē-ed'i-fī), v. t. [Early mod. E. also reædify; ME. redifyen; < OF. reedifier, F. réédifier = Sp. Pg. reedificar = It. riedificare, < LL. reædificare, build again, rebuild, < L. re-, again, + ædificare, build: see edify.] To rebuild; build again after destruction.

The ruin'd wals he did reædifye.
Spenser, F. Q., II. x. 46.

Return'd from Babylon by leave of kings
Their lords, whom God disposed, the house of God
They first re-edify. Milton, P. L., xii. 350.

reediness (rē'di-nes), n. The state or property of being reedy, in any sense.

It [the Liszt organ] possesses great freedom from reediness in sound. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII. 402.

The greater number of these tests are to detect reediness, lamination, or looseness in the fibrous structure of the iron, these defects occurring more frequently in angle, T, and beam irons than in plates.

Thearle, Naval Arch., § 332.

reeding (rē′ding), n. [< ME. redynge; verbal n. of reed[1], v.] 1. Thatching. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Redynge of howses. Arundinacio.

Prompt. Parv., p. 427.

2. In arch., a series of small convex or beaded moldings designed for ornament; also, the convex fluting or cabling characterizing some types of column.

These [external walls of Wuswus at Wurka] were plastered and covered by an elaborate series of reedings and square sinkings, forming a beautiful and very appropriate mode of adorning the wall of a building that had no external openings. J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 162.

3. The milling on the edge of a coin.—4. In silk-weaving. See the quotation.

Reeding and harnessing are subsidiary processes in putting the warp in proper shape on the loom. These consist in putting each warp-thread through its proper slit in the reed and eyelet in the harness.

Harper's Mag., LXXI. 256.

reed-instrument (rēd′in″strụ-ment), n. A musical instrument the tone of which is produced by the vibration of a reed; especially, an orchestral instrument of the oboe or of the clarinet family.

reed-knife (rēd′nīf), n. A long knife-shaped implement of metal for reaching and adjusting the tuning-wires of reed-pipes in a pipe-organ. Also called tuning-knife.

reedless (rēd′les), a. [< reed[1] + -less.] Destitute of reeds.

Youths tombed before their parents were,
Whom foul Cocytus' reedless banks enclose. May.

reedling (rēd′ling), n. [< reed[1] + -ling[1].] The bearded tit, Panurus or Calamophilus biarmicus, a common bird of Europe and Asia: so called from frequenting reeds. Also called reed-pheasant.

reed-mace (rēd′mās), n. The cattail; any plant of the genus Typha, chiefly T. latifolia and T. angustifolia, the great and the lesser reed-mace, the two species known in England and North America. T. latifolia is the common plant. It is a tall, straight, erect aquatic with long flag-like leaves and long dense spikes of small flowers, brown when mature. The abundant down of the ripened spikes makes a poor material for stuffing pillows, etc.; the leaves were formerly much used by coopers to prevent the joints of casks from leaking, and have been made into mats, chair-bottoms, etc. It is so named either directly from its reed-like character and the resemblance of its head to a mace (club), or (Prior, "Popular Names of British Plants") from its being placed in the hands of Christ as a mace or scepter in pictures and in statues. Less properly called bulrush. In the United States known almost exclusively as cattail or cattail flag.

reed-mote (rēd′mōt), n. Same as fescue, 1. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

reed-moth (rēd′môth), n. A British moth, Macrogaster arundinis.

reed-motion (rēd′mō″shọn), n. In weaving, the mechanism which, in power-looms, moves the batten, carrying the reed for beating up the weft between the threads of the warp. The term has also been inappropriately applied to a "stop-motion" whereby, when the shuttle is trapped in its passage through the warp, the movement of the batten is stopped, to prevent breaking warp-threads by the impact of the reed against the shuttle. See stop-motion.

reed-organ (rēd′ôr″gan), n. A musical instrument consisting essentially of one or more graduated sets of small free reeds of metal, which are sounded by streams of air set in motion by a bellows, and controlled from a keyboard like that of the pianoforte. The two principal varieties are the harmonium, which is common in Europe, and the so-called American organ, the chief essential difference between which is that the former is sounded by a compression-bellows driving the air outward through the reeds, and the latter by a suction-bellows drawing it inward through them. The tone of the harmonium is usually keener and more nasal than that of the American organ. The apparatus for compressing or exhausting the air, and for distributing the current among the various sets of reeds and among the channels belonging to the various digitals of the keyboard, is not essentially different from that of a pipe-organ, though on a much smaller scale. (See organ[1].) The bellows, however, is usually operated by means of alternating treadles. The keyboard is exactly similar to that of the pipe-organ or the pianoforte, and has a compass of about four or five octaves. The tone-producing apparatus consists of one or more sets of small brass vibrators or reeds (see illustration); the pitch of the tone depends on the size of their vibratile tongues, and its quality on their proportions and on the character of the resonating cavities with which they are connected. Each set of vibrators constitutes a stop, the use of which is controlled by a stop-knob. The possible variety of qualities is rather limited. The treadles operate feeders, which are connected with a general bellows, so that the current of air may be maintained at a constant tension; but in the harmonium the waste-valve of the bellows may be closed by drawing a stop-knob called the expression-stop, so that the force of the tones may be directly varied by the rapidity of the treadling. In the American organ the force of the tones is varied by a lever, operated by the player's knee, which opens or closes a shutter in the box inclosing the vibrators. The harmonium sometimes has a mechanism called the percussion, providing a little hammer to strike the tongue of each reed as its digital is depressed, thus setting it into vibration very promptly. A tremulant is often introduced, consisting of a revolving fan, by which the current of air is made to oscillate slightly. More than one manual keyboard and a pedal keyboard, with separate stops for each, as in the pipe-organ, occur in large instruments. Occasionally a set of pipes is also added. Various devices for sustaining tones in the bass after the fingers have left the digitals, or for emphasizing the treble, are sometimes introduced. Pianofortes are made with a harmonium attached (sometimes called an æolian attachment). The reed-organ has become one of the commonest of musical instruments. Its popularity rests upon its capacity for concerted music, like the pianoforte and pipe-organ, combined with simplicity, portability, cheapness, and stability of intonation. Artistically regarded, its tone is apt to be either weak and negative or harsh and unsympathetic. A variety of recent invention, the vocalion, has a remarkably powerful and mellow tone.

Reed-organ.

a, case; b, stop-rail and stops; c, music-rack; d, keyboard; e, one of the pedals or treadles; f, one of the pedal- or treadle-straps which operate the bellows g; h, pedal-spring which lifts the pedal after the latter has been relieved from the pressure of the foot; i, bellows-spring which opens the bellows after compression; j and k, upper and lower boards of wind-chest, inclosing space into which air is delivered from the bellows; j', reed-board, which supports the reeds in slots formed therein (see cut under reed[1]); k', k', swells (see cut below); l, reed-valve; m, valve-spring which closes the valve after the latter is opened by push-pin shown in the cut below. There is one of these valves for each key, admitting wind to one or more reeds of a set or such sets of reeds as are allowed to act by the stops pulled out, and of a particular tone corresponding with the key; n, stop-arm; o, key-frame.

Stop-action of Reed-organ.

b, stop-rail; b', stop-knob; b'', stop-shank; n, stop-arm; n', rock-lever, connected at n'' to the lever r, the latter being pivoted to a rail at s. A downwardly projecting arm engages the crank of another rock-lever t, connecting with and actuating the stop-valve u; k, k, swells; l, reed-valve opened by the push-pin v, and closed by the spring m.

reed-palm (rēd′päm), n. A ratan-palm; a palm of the genus Calamus.

reed-pheasant (rēd′fez″ant), n. The bearded titmouse or reedling, Panurus biarmicus: so called in allusion to the long tail. Also called simply pheasant. [Norfolk, Eng.]

reed-pipe (rēd′pīp), n. In organ-building, a pipe whose tone is produced by the vibration of a reed or tongue: opposed to flue-pipe. Such pipes consist of a foot or mouthpiece containing the reed, and a tubular body furnishing a column of air for sympathetic vibration. The term reed is applied to both the vibratile tongue and the mechanism immediately surrounding it. In the latter sense, a reed consists of a metal tube connecting the foot and the body of the pipe; at its lower end is an oblong opening or eschallot, over or in which is fixed the brass tongue or reed proper. The effective length of the tongue is controlled by a movable spring or tuning-wire, the head of which projects outside the pipe-foot. The pitch of the tone depends primarily upon the vibrating length of the tongue, but is modified by the length of the air-column in the body of the pipe. A reed-pipe, therefore, is tuned both on the reed and on the top of the pipe. The quality of the tone depends somewhat on the form of the tongue, but chiefly on that of the body as a whole. The force of the tone depends on the pressure of the air-current, on the size of the inlet to the foot, and on the exact adjustment of the tongue to the eschallot. Most reed-pipes have striking reeds, but free reeds are occasionally used. A set of reed-pipes is called a reed-stop.

reed-pit (rēd′pit), n. [ME. reede pytte; < reed[1] + pit[1].] A fen. Prompt. Parv. (Halliwell.) reed-plane (rēd′plān), n. In joinery, a concave-soled plane used in making reeding.

reed-sparrow (rēd′spar″ō), n. Same as reed-bunting. [Local, Eng.]

reed-stop (rēd′stop), n. In organ-building, a set or register of reed-pipes the use of which is controlled by a single stop-knob: opposed to flue-stop. Each partial organ usually has one or more such stops, though they are less invariable in the pedal organ than in the others. They are generally intended to imitate some orchestral instrument, as the trumpet (usually placed in the great organ), the oboe (usually in the swell organ), the clarinet (usually in the choir organ), the trombone (usually in the pedal organ), the cornopean, the clarion, the contrafagotto, etc. They may be of eight-feet, four-feet, or sixteen-feet tone. (See organ[1].) Reed-stops are specially valuable because of their powerful, incisive, and individual quality, which is suited both for solo effects and for the enrichment of all kinds of combinations. The most peculiar reed-stop is the vox humana. A reed-stop is often called simply a reed.

reed-thrush (rēd′thrush), n. The greater reed-warbler, Acrocephalus turdoides.

Specimens of the . . . reed-thrush, to use its oldest English name.

Yarrell, Brit. Birds (4th ed.), I. 365. (Encyc. Dict.)

reed-tussock (rēd′tus″ọk), n. A British moth, Orgyia cænosa. See tussock.

reed-wainscot (rēd′wān″skọt), n. A British moth, Nonagria cannæ.

reed-warbler (rēd′wâr″blėr), n. One of a group of Old World sylviine birds, constituting the genus Acrocephalus. The species to which the name specially applies is A. streperus or A. arundinaceus, also called Calamoherpe or Salicaria arundinacea. Another species, A. turdoides, is known as the greater reed-warbler, reed-thrush, and reed-wren.

reed-work (rēd′wėrk), n. In organ-building, the reed-stops of an organ, or of a partial organ, taken collectively: opposed to flue-work.

reed-wren (rēd′ren), n. 1. The greater reed-warbler.—2. An American wren of the family Troglodytidæ and genus Thryothorus, as the great Carolina wren, T. carolinensis, or Bewick's wren, T. bewicki. There are many species, chiefly of the subtropical parts of America, the two named being the only ones which inhabit much of the United States.

reedy (rē′di), a. [< reed[1] + -y[1]. Cf. AS. hreódiht, reedy.] 1. Abounding with reeds.

Ye heathy wastes, immix'd with reedy fens.

Burns, Elegy on Miss Burnet.

2. Consisting of or resembling a reed.

With the tip of her reedy wand
Making the sign of the cross.

Longfellow, Blind Girl of Castèl Cuillè, i.

3. Noting a tone like that produced from a reed-instrument. Such tones are usually somewhat nasal, and are often thin and cutting.

The blessed little creature answered me in a voice of such heavenly sweetness, with that reedy thrill in it which you have heard in the thrush's even-song, that I hear it at this moment. O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, ix.

4. Noting a quality of iron in which bars or plates of it have the nature of masses of rods imperfectly welded together.

reef[1] (rēf), n. [Formerly riff; < D. rif = MLG. rif, ref, LG. riff, reff (> G. riff), a reef, = Icel. rif = Dan. rev, a reef, sand-bank; akin to Icel. rifa, a fissure, rift, rent, = Sw. refva, a strip, cleft, gap; Sw. refvel, a sand-bank, = Dan. revle, a sand-bank, bar, shoal, a strip of land, a lath; prob. from the verb, Icel. rīfa, etc., rive, split: see rive[1]. Cf. rift[1].] 1. A low, narrow ridge of rocks, rising ordinarily but a few feet above the water. A reef passes by increase of size into an island. The word is especially used with reference to those low islands which are formed of coralline debris. See atoll, and coral reef, below.

Atolls have been formed during the sinking of the land by the upward growth of the reefs which primarily fringed the shores of ordinary islands.

Darwin, Coral Reefs, p. 165.

The league-long roller thundering on the reef.

Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

2. Any extensive elevation of the bottom of the sea; a shoal; a bank: so called by fishermen.

The riff, or bank of rocks, on which the French fleet was lost, runs along from the east and to the northward about three miles. Dampier, Voyages, I., an. 1681, note.

3. In Australia, the same as lode, vein, or ledge of the Cordilleran miner: as, a quartz-reef (that is, a quartz-vein).

Many a promising gold field has been ruined by having bad machinery put up on it. Reefs that would have paid handsomely with good machinery are abandoned as unpayable, and the field is deserted.
H. Finch-Hatton, Advance Australia, p. 218.

4. A kind of commercial sponge which grows on reefs. [A trade-name.]

British Consul Little of Havana says, according to the "Journal of the Society of Arts," that the classes [of sponges] included are sheep wool, velvet, hard-head, yellow, grass, and glova. Very little reef, if any, is found in Cuba. Science, XIV. 351.

Coral reef, an accumulation of calcareous material which has been secreted from the water of the tropical ocean, and especially of the Pacific to the south of the equator, by the reef-building corals. Such accumulations, which are often of great dimensions, offer curious peculiarities of form and distribution. They have been classified under the names of fringing and barrier reefs and atolls. Fringing reefs border the land; barrier reefs extend parallel with but at some distance from the shore; atolls are rudely elliptical or irregular in form, and typical atolls inclose a lagoon, which usually communicates with the ocean by one or more passages through the reef. Barrier reefs may be hundreds of miles in length; that off the shore of Australia is 1,250 miles long, and from 10 to 90 broad. Atolls vary from 1 to 50 miles and over in diameter. The principal mass of a coral reef consists essentially of dead coral, together with more or less of the skeletons and shells of other marine organisms; this dead material is mingled with debris resulting from the action of breakers and currents on the coralline formation. The exterior of such a reef, where conditions are favorable to the development of the coral animals, especially on its seaward face, is covered with a layer or mantle of living and growing coral, and the rapidity and vigor of this growth depend on the supply of food brought by the oceanic currents. Where the conditions for this supply have not been favorable, there the reefs are not found; where the conditions have been such as to encourage growth, but have ceased to have this character, there the formation of the reef has slackened or been stopped altogether. Investigations have shown that the reef-building corals cannot flourish where the temperature of the surface-water sinks below 70°; in the typical coral regions the temperature is decidedly higher than that, and its range very small. Neither can the reef-builders work at a considerable depth, or above the level of low tide; their entire vertical range is not more than 15 or 20 fathoms at the utmost. These conditions of coral-reef formation, coupled with the fact that the carbonate of lime in the form in which it has been left by the death of the organisms by which it was secreted is decidedly soluble in sea-water, are sufficient to account for all the peculiarities in the distribution and mode of occurrence of these remarkable structures. It is because the currents sweeping toward the eastern shores of the continents are warm and constant that, while the western sides of Africa and South America exhibit only isolated patches of coral, the eastern borders are abundantly supplied with it. It is not now considered necessary to call in the assistance of a general subsidence of the Pacific Ocean bottom in order to account for the form of the atolls; for it is the opinion of most of the recent investigators that all the characteristic features of the coral formations—whether these occur as fringing or barrier reefs, or as atolls—can be produced in regions of subsidence or of elevation, as well as in those where no change of level is taking place.

reef[2] (rēf), n. [Formerly riff; < ME. riff, < MD. rif (also rift), D. reef = LG. reff, riff (> G. reef, reff) = Icel. rif = Sw. ref = Dan. reb, a reef of a sail; of uncertain origin; perhaps of like origin with reef[1]. Hence reef[2], v., and reeve[3].] Naut., a part of a sail rolled or folded up, in order to diminish the extent of canvas exposed to the wind. In topsails and courses, and sometimes in topgallantsails, the reef is the part of the sail between the head and the first reef-band, or between any two reef-bands; in fore-and-aft sails reefs are taken on the foot. There are generally three or four reefs in topsails, and one or two in courses.

Calms are our dread; when tempests plough the deep,
We take a reef, and to the rocking sleep.
Crabbe, Works, I. 48.

Close reef. See close[2].—French reef, reefing of sails when they are fitted with rope jackstays instead of points.

reef[2] (rēf), v. [< reef[2], n. Cf. the doublet reeve[3].] I. trans. 1. Naut., to take a reef or reefs in; reduce the size of (a sail) by rolling or folding up a part and securing it by tying reef-points about it. In square sails the reef-points are tied round the yard as well as the sail; in fore-and-aft sails they may or may not be tied round the boom which extends the foot of the sail. In very large ships, where the yards are so large as to make it inconvenient to tie the reef-points around them, the sails are sometimes reefed to jackstays on the yards.

Up, aloft, lads! Come, reef both topsails!
Davenant and Dryden, Tempest, i. 1.

2. To gather up stuff of any kind in a way similar to that described in def. 1. Compare reefing.—Close reefed, the condition of a sail when all its reefs have been taken in.—To reef paddles, in steamships, to disconnect the float-boards from the paddle-arms and bolt them again nearer the center of the wheel, in order to diminish the dip when the vessel is deep.—To reef the bowsprit, to rig in the bowsprit. The phrase usually has application to yachts; men-of-war are said to rig in their bowsprits.

The bowsprits on cutters can be reefed by being drawn closer in and fidded. Yachtman's Guide.

II. intrans. See the quotation. [Colloq.]

In some subtle way, however, when the driver moves the bit to and fro in his mouth, the effect is to enliven and stimulate the horse, as if something of the jockey's spirit were thus conveyed to his mind. If this motion be performed with an exaggerated movement of the arm, it is called reefing. The Atlantic, LXIV. 115.

reef[3] (rēf), a. and n. [Also (Sc.) reif, rief; < ME. ref, < AS. hreóf, scabby, leprous, rough (> hreófol, hreófl, scabbiness, leprosy, hreóflig, leprous, hreófla, a leper), = OHG. riob, leprous, = Icel. hrjūfr, scabby, rough. Cf. Icel. ryf, scurf, eruption of the skin; perhaps connected with rīfa, break: see rive.] I. a. Scabby; scurvy.

Kings and nations, swith awa!
Reif randies, I disown ye!
Burns, Louis, What Reck I by Thee?

II. n. 1. The itch; also, any eruptive disorder. [Prov. Eng.]—2. Dandruff. [Prov. Eng.]

reef-band (rēf′band), n. A strong strip of canvas extending across a sail, in a direction parallel to its head or foot, to strengthen it. The reef-band has eyelet-holes at regular intervals for the reef-points which secure it when reefed.—Balance reef-band, a reef-band extending diagonally across a fore-and-aft sail. See reef[2], n.

reef-builder (rēf′bil″dėr), n. Any coral which builds a reef.

reef-building (rēf′bil″ding), a. Constructing or building up a coral reef, as a reef-builder.

reef-cringle (rēf′kring″gl), n. See cringle (a).

reef-earing (rēf′ēr″ing), n. See earing[1].

reefer[1] (rē′fėr), n. [< reef[1] + -er[1].] An oyster that grows on reefs in the wild or untransplanted state; a reef-oyster.

reefer[2] (rē′fėr), n. [< reef[2] + -er[1].] 1. One who reefs: a name familiarly applied to midshipmen, because they attended in the tops during the operation of reefing. Admiral Smyth.

The steerage or gun-room was ever heaven, the scene of happiness unalloyed, the home of darling reefers who own the hearts they won long years ago, the abode of briny mirth, of tarry jollity. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 166.

2. A short coat or jacket worn by sailors and fishermen, and copied for general use by the fashions of 1888–90.

reef-goose (rēf′gös), n. The common wild goose of North America, Bernicla canadensis. See cut under Bernicla. [North Carolina.]

reefing (rē′fing), n. [Verbal n. of reef[2], v.] In upholstery, the gathering up of the material of a curtain, valance, or the like, as in short festoons.

reefing-beckets (rē′fing-bek″ets), n. pl. Sennet straps fitted with an eye and toggle, used in reefing when sails are fitted with French reefs. The toggle part is generally seized to the iron jackstay on the yard, and the tail of the strap is taken around the rope jackstay on the sail, the eye being then placed over the toggle.

reefing-jacket (rē′fing-jak″et), n. A close-fitting jacket or short coat made of strong heavy cloth.

reefing-point (rē′fing-point), n. Naut., a reef-point.

reef-jig, reef-jigger (rēf′jig, -jig″ėr), n. Naut., a small tackle sometimes used in reefing to stretch the reef-band taut before knotting the points.

reef-knot (rēf′not), n. Same as square knot (which see, under knot[1]).

reef-line (rēf′līn), n. Naut., a temporary means of spilling a sail, arranged so that it can serve when the wind is blowing fresh.

reef-oyster (rēf′ois″tėr), n. A reefer. See reefer[1] and oyster.

reef-pendant (rēf′pen″dant), n. Naut., in fore-and-aft sails, a rope through a sheave-hole in the boom, with a tackle attached, to haul the after-leech down to the boom while reefing; in square sails, a rope fastened to the leech of the sail and rove up through the yard-arm, having a purchase hooked to the upper end, to serve as a reef-tackle.

reef-point (rēf′point), n. Naut., a short piece of rope fastened by the middle in each eyelet-hole of a reef-band, to secure the sail in reefing.

reef-squid (rēf′skwid), n. A lashing or earing used aboard the luggers on the south coast of England to lash the outer cringle of the sail when reefing.

reef-tackle (rēf′tak″l), n. Naut., a tackle fastened to the leeches of a sail below the close-reef band, used to haul the leeches of the sail up to the yard to facilitate reefing.

reek[1] (rēk), v. [< ME. reken, reoken; (a) < AS. reċan (strong verb, pret. reác, pl. rucon), smoke, steam, = OFries. riaka = D. rieken, ruiken = MLG. ruken, LG. ruiken, rieken = OHG. riuhhan, riohhan, MHG. riechen, G. riechen (pret. roch), smell, rauchen, smoke, = Icel. rjūka (pret. rauk, pl. ruku) = Sw. röka, ryka = Dan. røge, ryge = Goth. riukan* (not recorded), smoke; (b) < AS. rēcan (pret. rēhte) (= OFries. rēka = D. rooken = MLG. rōken = OHG. rouhan = Icel. reykja), tr., smoke, steam. Hence reek[1], n. No connection with Skt. raja, rajas, dimness, sky, dust, pollen, rajani, night, √ ranj, dye.] I. intrans. To smoke; steam; exhale.

The encence out of the fyr reketh sote [sweet].
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2612.

Frae many a spout came running out
His reeking-het red gore.
Battle of Tranent-Muir (Child's Ballads, VII. 170).

I found me laid
In balmy sweat, which with his beams the sun
Soon dried, and on the reeking moisture fed.
Milton, P. L., viii. 256.

The reeking entrails on the fire they threw,
And to the gods the grateful odour flew.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xii. 211.

The floor reeked with the recent scrubbing, and the goddess did not like the smell of brown soap.
Thackeray, Pendennis, lxvi.

II. trans. To smoke; expose to smoke.

After the halves [of the moulds] are so coated or reeked, they are fitted together.
W. H. Greenwood, Steel and Iron, p. 423.

reek[1] (rēk), n. [< ME. reek, rek, rike, reik (also assibilated reche, > E. reech), < AS. rēc, smoke, vapor, = OS. rōk = OFries. rēk = D. rook = MLG. roke, LG. rook = OHG. rouh, MHG. rouch, G. rauch, smoke, vapor, = Icel. reykr, smoke, steam (cf. rökr, twilight: see Ragnarök), = Sw. rök = Dan. røg, smoke; from the verb. Cf. Goth. rikwis, darkness, smoke.] 1. Smoke; vapor; steam; exhalation; fume. [Obsolete, archaic, or Scotch.]

You common cry of curs! whose breath I hate
As reek o' the rotten fens. Shak., Cor., iii. 3. 121.

As hateful to me as the reek of a lime-kiln.
Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 3. 86.

The reek it rose, and the flame it flew,
And oh the fire augmented high.
Quoted in Child's Ballads, VI. 178.

The reek o' the cot hung over the plain
Like a little wee cloud in the world its lane.
Hogg, Kilmeny.

2†. Incense.

Reke, that is a gretyngful prayer of men that do penance. MS. Coll. Eton. 10, f. 25. (Halliwell.)

Kale through the reek. See kale.

reek[2]† (rēk), n. [< ME. reek, < AS. hreác = Icel. hraukr, a heap, rick. Cf. the related rick and ruck.] A rick; also, a small bundle of hay. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

I'll instantly set all my hinds to thrashing
Of a whole reek of corn.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, ii. 1. (Nares.) reeky (rē′ki), a. [Also in Sc. spelling reekie, and assibilated reechy; < reek[1] + -y[1].] 1. Smoky; soiled with smoke.

Now he [the devil] 's taen her hame to his ain reeky den.
Burns (1st ed.), There lived a Carle on Kellyburn Braes.

2. Giving out reek or vapor; giving out fumes or odors, especially offensive odors. See reek[1].

Shut me nightly in a charnel-house, . . .
With reeky shanks, and yellow chapless skulls.
Shak., R. and J., iv. 1. 83.

Seeing the reeky
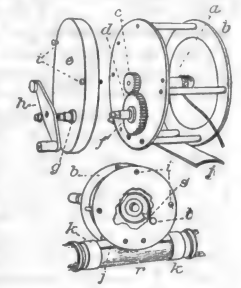
Repast placed before him, scarce able to speak, he
In ecstasy mutter'd, "By Jove, Cocky-leeky!"
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 310.

reel[1] (rēl), n. [< ME. reel, reele, rele, reyle, a reel, < AS. reól, also hreól (glossing ML. alibrum), a reel; cf. Icel. hræll, ræll, a weavers' rod or sley; Gael. ruidhil, a reel for winding yarn on. Root unknown. Cf. reel[2].] A cylinder or frame turning on an axis, on which thread, yarn, string, rope, etc., are wound. Specifically—(a) A roller or bobbin for thread used in sewing; a spool.



Down went the blue-frilled work-basket, . . . dispersing on the floor reels, thimble, muslin-work.
George Eliot, Felix Holt, v.

(b) A machine on which yarn is wound to form it into hanks, skeins, etc.

Oh leeze me on my spinning-wheel,
Oh leeze me on my rock an' reel.
Burns, Bess and her Spinning-Wheel.

(c) In rope-making, the frame on which the spun-yarns are wound as each length is twisted, previous to tarring or laying up into strands. (d) The revolving frame upon which silk-fiber is wound from the cocoon. (e) Anything prepared for winding thread upon, as an open framework turning on a pivot at each end, upon which thread is wound as it is spun, or when a skein is opened for use. (f) In teleg., a barrel on which the strip of paper for receiving the message is wound in a recording telegraph. Encyc. Dict. (g) A winch used by English and Scotch whalemen for regaining the tow-line. It is not employed by Americans. (h) Naut., a revolving frame varying in size, used for winding up hawsers, hose, lead-line, log-lines, etc. (i) A windlass for hoisting oyster-dredges. (j) In milling, the drum on which the bolting-cloth is placed. (k) In agri., a cylinder formed of light slats and radial arms, used with a reaper to gather the grain into convenient position for the knives to operate on it, and to direct its fall on the platform. (l) In baking, a cylindrical frame carrying bread-pans suspended from the horizontal arms of the frame. It is used in a form of oven called a reel oven. (m) A device used in angling, attached to the rod, for winding the line, consisting of a cylinder revolving on an axis moved by a small crank or spring. The salmon-reel is about four inches, and the trout-reel about two inches in diameter; the length is about two inches. In angling the reel plays an important part, its use and action requiring to be in perfect accord or correspondence with the play of the rod and line. To meet these requirements, clicks and multipliers are employed. The click checks the line from running out too freely, and the multiplier gathers in the slack with increased speed. (n) A hose-carriage.—Off the reel, one after another without a break; in uninterrupted succession: as, to win three games off the reel. [Colloq.]—Reel-and-bead molding, in arch., etc., a simple molding consisting of elongated or spindle-shaped bodies alternating with beads either spherical or flattened in the direction of the molding.—Reel of paper, a continuous roll of paper as made for use on web printing-machines. [Eng.]—Reel oven. See oven.

Click-reel.

a, spool journaled in sides of the frame or case b; c, pinion on the axis of the spool; d, small gear meshing with c (in use these wheels are covered by the cover e); f, axis of the wheel d (this axis is squared on the outer end and fits into the crank-socket g, when the cover e is attached to the frame by small screws r); h, crank fitted to crank-socket g; j, reel-seat; k, k, reel-bands which fasten the reel-seat to the rod r; s, click which, when not pressed out of engagement with a small serrated wheel on the end of the spool-shaft opposite the pinion c, emits a sound when the line is running out and warns the sportsman that his bait is taken; t, click-button, which presses out the click from its engagement with the serrated wheel, as when winding in the line.

Reel-and-bead Molding.

1. Greek (Erechtheum). 2. Renaissance (Venice).

reel[1] (rēl), v. t. [< ME. relen, reolen, relien, reel; from the noun: see reel[1], n. Cf. reel[2], v.] To wind upon a reel, as yarn or thread from the spindle, or a fishing-line.

> To karde and to kembe, to clouten and to wasche,
> To rubbe and rely. Piers Plowman (C), x. 81.

> I say nothing of his lips; for they are so thin and slender that, were it the fashion to reel lips as they do yarn, one might make a skein of them.
> Jarvis, tr. of Don Quixote, II. iii. 15. (Davies.)

> Silk reeling is one of the industries.
> Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 47.

To reel in, in angling, to recover by winding on the reel (the line that has been paid out).—To reel off, to give out or produce with ease and fluency, or in a rapid and continuous manner. [Colloq.]

> Mr. Wark and Mr. Paulhamus [telegraphers], who sent in the order named, reeled off exactly the same number of words. Electric Rev. (Amer.), XVI. viii. 7.

To reel up, to wind up or take in on a reel (all the line).

reel[2] (rēl), v. [Early mod. E. also rele; < ME. relen, turn round and round; appar. a particular use of reel[1], v., but cf. Icel. ridhlask, rock, waver, move to and fro (as ranks in battle), < ritha, tremble. Not connected with roll.] I. intrans. 1. To turn round and round; whirl.

> Hit [the boat] reled on roun[d] vpon the roȝe ythes [rough waves]. Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), iii. 147.

2. To sway from side to side in standing or walking; stagger, especially as one drunk.

> To knyȝtez he kest his yȝe, > & reled hym vp & doun.
> Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 229.

> But when they saw the Almayne rele and staggar, then they let fall the rayle betwene them.
> Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 6.

> The tinker he laid on so fast,
> That he made Robin reel.
> Robin Hood and the Tinker (Child's Ballads, V. 235).

> Nathelesse so sore a buff to him it lent
> That made him reele, and to his brest his bever bent.
> Spenser, F. Q., II. v. 6.

> Flecked darkness like a drunkard reels
> From forth day's path. Shak., R. and J., ii. 3. 3.

> She [France] staggered and reeled under the burden of the war. Bolingbroke, State of Europe, viii.

3. To be affected with a whirling or dizzy sensation: as, his brain reeled.

> Your fine Tom Jones and Grandisons,
> They make your youthful fancies reel.
> Burns, Oh leave Novels.

> When all my spirit reels
> At the shouts, the leagues of lights,
> And the roaring of the wheels.
> Tennyson, Maud, xxvi.

=Syn. 2. Reel, Stagger, and Totter have in common the idea of an involuntary unsteadiness, a movement toward falling. Only animate beings reel or stagger; a tower or other erect object may totter. Reel suggests dizziness or other loss of balance; stagger suggests a burden too great to be carried steadily, or a walk such as one would have in carrying such a burden; totter suggests weakness: one reels upon being struck on the head; a drunken man, a wounded man, staggers; the infant and the very aged totter.

> Pale he turn'd, and reel'd, and would have fall'n,
> But that they stay'd him up. Tennyson, Guinevere.

> His breast heaved, and he staggered in his place,
> And stretched his strong arms forth with a low moan.
> William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 279.

> He [Newcastle] thought it better to construct a weak and rotten government, which tottered at the smallest breath, . . . than to pay the necessary price for sound and durable materials. Macaulay, William Pitt.

II.† trans. 1. To turn about; roll about.

> Runischly his rede ygen [eyes] he reled aboute.
> Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 304.

2. To roll.

> And Sisyphus an huge round stone did reele > Against an hill. Spenser, F. Q., I. v. 35.

3. To reel or stagger through.

> You are too indulgent. Let us grant, it is not > Amiss to . . . keep the turn of tippling with a slave;
> To reel the streets at noon. Shak., A. and C., i. 4. 20.

4. To cause to reel, stagger, totter, or shake.

reel[2] (rēl), n. [< reel[2], v.] A staggering motion, as that of a drunken man; giddiness.

> (The attendant . . . carries off Lepidus [drunk].) . . .
> Eno. Drink thou; increase the reels.
> Shak., A. and C., ii. 7. 100.

> Instinctively she paused before the arched window, and looked out upon the street, in order to seize its permanent objects with her mental grasp, and thus to steady herself from the reel and vibration which affected her more immediate sphere. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xvi.

reel[3] (rēl), n. [Formerly also reill; < Gael. righil, a reel (dance).] 1. A lively dance, danced by two or three couples, and consisting of various circling or intertwining figures. It is very popular in Scotland. The strathspey (which see) is slower, and full of sudden jerks and turns.

> There's threesome reels, there's foursome reels,
> There's hornpipes and strathspeys, man.
> Burns, The Deil cam Fiddlin' thro' the Town.

> Blythe an' merry we's be a', . . .
> And dance, till we be like to fa',
> The reel of Tullochgorum.
> Rev. J. Skinner, Tullochgorum.

2. Music for such a dance or in its rhythm, which is duple (or rarely sextuple), and characterized by notes of equal length.

> Geilles Duncane did goe before them, playing this reill or daunce upon a small trump.
> Newes from Scotland (1591), sig. B. iii.

Virginia reel, a country-dance supposed to be derived from the English "Sir Roger de Coverley." [U. S.]

reel[3] (rēl), v. i. [< reel[3], n.] To dance the reel; especially, to describe the figure 8 as in a reel.

> The dancers quick and quicker flew;
> They reel'd, they set, they cross'd, they cleekit.
> Burns, Tam o' Shanter.

reelable (rē'la-bl), a. [< reel[1] + -able.] Capable of being reeled, or wound on a reel.

> At least six species of Bombyx . . . form reelable cocoons. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 60.

reel-bed (rēl'bed), n. The place on an anglers' rod where the reel is fitted; a reel-seat.

reel-check (rēl'chek), n. Any device for checking the run of a fishing-line from the reel.

reel-click (rēl'klik), n. An attachment to an anglers' reel, by a light pressure of which the movement of the line is directed. It checks the line from running out too freely. Some clicks graduate the strain upon the line, checking it almost entirely, or permitting it to run without any check at all. The click also indicates to the ear what the fish is doing.

reel-cotton (rēl'kot″n), n. Sewing-cotton which is sold on reels instead of being made up into balls, including generally the finer grades. Compare spool-cotton.

reëlect (rē-ē-lekt′), v. t. [< re- + elect. Cf. F. réélire, reëlect, = Sp. reelegir = Pg. reeleger = It. rieleggere.] To elect again.

> The chief of these was the strategos or commander-in-chief, who held his office for a year, and could only be re-elected after a year's interval. Brougham.

reëlection (rē-ē-lek′shon), n. [= F. réélection = Sp. reelección = Pg. reeleição = It. rielezione; as re- + election.] Election a second time for the same office: as, the reëlection of a former representative.

> Several acts have been made, and rendered ineffectual by leaving the power of reelection open. Swift.

> Several Presidents have held office for two consecutive terms. . . . Might it not be on the whole a better system to forbid immediate re-election, but to allow re-election at any later vacancy? E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 381.

reeler (rē'lèr), n. 1. One who reels, in any sense; specifically, a silk-winder.

> The syndicate were able to advance somewhat the price of cocoons, and to induce the reelers to provide themselves liberally for fear of a further rise.
> U. S. Cons. Report, No. 73 (1887), p. lxxxiv.

2. The grasshopper-warbler, Acrocephalus nævius: so called from its note. [Local, Eng.]

> In the more marshy parts of England . . . this bird has long been known as the Reeler, from the resemblance of its song to the noise of the reel used, even at the beginning of the present century, by the hand-spinners of wool. But, this kind of reel being now dumb, in such districts the country-folks of the present day connect the name with the reel used by the fishermen.
> Yarrell, Brit. Birds (4th ed.), I. 385. (Encyc. Dict.)

reel-holder (rēl'hōl″dėr), n. 1. A frame or box with pins upon which reels of silk, cotton, etc., for use in sewing can be put, free to revolve, and kept from being scattered. See spool-holder. [Eng.]—2. Naut., on a man-of-war, one of the watch on deck who is stationed to hold the reel and haul in the line whenever the log is heaved to ascertain the ship's speed.

reëligibility (rē-el″i-ji-bil′i-ti), n. [= F. rééligibilité; as reëligible + -ity (see -bility).] Eligibility for being reëlected to the same office.

> With a positive duration [of the presidency] of considerable extent I connect the circumstance of re-eligibility.
> A. Hamilton, The Federalist, No. 72.

> There is another strong feature in the new constitution which I as strongly dislike. That is, the perpetual re-eligibility of the President.
> Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 291.

reëligible (rē-el'i-ji-bl), a. [= F. rééligible = It. rieleggibile; as re- + eligible.] Capable of being elected again to the same office.

> One of his friends introduced a bill to make the tribunes legally reëligible. Froude, Cæsar, p. 29.

Wines on the lees well refined. Isa. xxv. 6.

The temper of my love, whose flame I find Fin'd and refin'd too oft, but faintles flashes,
And must within short time fall down in ashes.
Stirling, Aurora, Sonnet xxii.

Now the table was furnished with fat things, and wine that was well refined. Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 122.

2. In metal., to bring into a condition of purity as complete as the nature of the ore treated will allow. Used chiefly with reference to gold and silver, especially with reference to the separation (parting) of these two metals from each other and from the baser metals with which they are combined in what are known as bullion-bars or bricks of mixed metals, as they come from the mills located at or near the mines. Refining is, in general, the last stage or stages in the metallurgical treatment of an ore. As the term refining is commonly used with reference to the manufacture of iron, it means the partial decarburization and purification of pig in the open-hearth furnace, for the purpose of rendering it more suitable for use in the puddling-furnace in which the process of converting it into malleable iron is completed. This method of puddling is called dry puddling. The operation of converting pig- into wrought-iron in the open-hearth furnace, when begun and completed without puddling, is generally called fining, and in this process charcoal or coke is used. There are many modifications of the fining process, but the principle is the same in all. In puddling, raw coal is used, and the fuel does not come in contact with the metal; in fining, the ore and fuel (either charcoal or coke) are together upon the same hearth. The various fining processes for converting pig- into wrought-iron, with charcoal as fuel, were of great importance before the invention of puddling, by which method much the larger part of the wrought-iron now used in the world is prepared, and this is done, for the most part, without previous partial decarburization of the pig in the refinery, by the process known as wet puddling, or pig-boiling. See puddle[1] and finery[2].

I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined. Zech. xiii. 9.

To gild refined gold, to paint the lily.
Shak., K. John, iv. 2. 11.

3. To purify from what is gross, coarse, debasing, low, vulgar, inelegant, rude, clownish, and the like; make elegant; raise or educate, as the taste; give culture to; polish: as, to refine the manners, taste, language, style, intellect, or moral feelings.

So it more faire accordingly it [beauty] makes,
And the grosse matter of this earthly myne
Which clotheth it thereafter doth refyne.
Spenser, In Honour of Beautie, l. 47.

Love refines
The thoughts, and heart enlarges.
Milton, P. L., viii. 590.

Refined madder. See madder[1].

II. intrans. 1. To become pure; be cleared of feculent matter.

So the pure limpid stream, when foul with stains,
Works itself clear, and, as it runs, refines. Addison.

2. To improve in accuracy, delicacy, or in anything that constitutes excellence.

Chaucer has refined on Boccace, and has mended the stories which he has borrowed. Dryden, Pref. to Fables.

But let a lord once own the happy lines,
How the wit brightens! how the style refines!
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 421.

A new generation, refining upon the lessons given by himself [Shelley] and Keats, has carried the art of rhythm to extreme variety and finish. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 380.

3. To exhibit nicety or subtlety in thought or language, especially excessive nicety.

You speak like good blunt soldiers; and 'tis well enough;
But did you live at court, as I do, gallants,
You would refine, and learn an apter language.
Fletcher (and another), False One, iii. 2.

Who, too deep for his hearers, still went on refining,
And thought of convincing, while they thought of dining.
Goldsmith, Retaliation, l. 35.

refined (rē-fīnd′), p. a. Purified; elevated; cultivated; subtle: as, a refined taste; a refined discrimination; refined society.

There be men that be so sharp, and so over-sharpe or refined, that it seemeth little unto them to interprete words, but also they holde it for an office to diuine thoughts.
Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 133.

Modern taste
Is so refin'd, and delicate, and chaste.
Cowper, Table-Talk, l. 511.

refinedly (rē-fī′ned-li), adv. With refinement; with nicety or elegance, especially excessive nicety.

Will any dog . . .
Refinedly leave his bitches and his bones,
To turn a wheel?
Dryden, Essay upon Satire, l. 135.

Some have refinedly expounded that passage in Matt. xii.
Calvin, On Jonah (Calv. Trans. Soc., 1847), p. 20.

refinedness (rē-fī′ned-nes), n. The state of being refined; purity; refinement; also, affected purity.

Great semblances of peculiar sanctimony, integrity, scrupulosity, spirituality, refinedness. Barrow, Works, III. xv.

refinement (rē-fīn′ment), n. [= Pg. refinamento; as refine + -ment. Cf. F. raffinement = It. raffinamento.] 1. The act of refining or purifying; the act of separating from a substance all extraneous matter; purification; clarification: as, the refinement of metals or liquors.

The soul of man is capable of very high refinements, even to a condition purely angelical.
Dr. H. More, Immortal. of Soul, iii. 1.

2. The state of being pure or purified.

The more bodies are of a kin to spirit in subtilty and refinement, the more diffusive are they. Norris.

3. The state of being free from what is coarse, rude, inelegant, debasing, or the like; purity of taste, mind, etc.; elegance of manners or language; culture.

I am apt to doubt whether the corruptions in our language have not at least equalled the refinements of it.
Swift, Improving the English Tongue.

This refined taste is the consequence of education and habit; we are born only with a capacity of entertaining this refinement, as we are born with a disposition to receive and obey all the rules and regulations of society.
Sir J. Reynolds, Discourses, xiii.

Refinement as opposed to simplicity of taste is not necessarily a mark of a good æsthetic faculty.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 544.

4. That which proceeds from refining or a desire to refine; a result of elaboration, polish, or nicety: often used to denote an over-nicety, or affected subtlety: as, the refinements of logic or philosophy; the refinements of cunning.

It is the Poet's Refinement upon this Thought which I most admire. Addison, Spectator, No. 303.

From the small experience I have of courts, I have ever found refinements to be the worst sort of all conjectures; . . . of some hundreds of facts, for the real truth of which I can account, I never yet knew any refiner to be once in the right. Swift, Change in Queen's Ministry.

As used in Greece, its [the Doric column's] beauty was very much enhanced by a number of refinements whose existence was not suspected till lately, and even now cannot be detected but by the most practised eye. J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 249.

5†. Excessive or extravagant compliment; a form of expression intended to impose on the hearer.

I must tell you a great piece of refinement of Harley. He charged me to come to him often; I told him I was loth to trouble him in so much business as he had, and desired I might have leave to come at his levee; which he immediately refused, and said that was not a place for friends to come to. Swift, Journal to Stella, v.

=Syn. 3. Cultivation, etc. See culture.

refiner (rē-fī′nėr), n. 1. One who refines liquors, sugar, metals, etc.

And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver. Mal. iii. 3.

2. An improver in purity and elegance.

As they have been the great refiners of our language, so it hath been my chief ambition to imitate them. Swift.

3. An inventor of superfluous subtleties; one who is overnice in discrimination, or in argument, reasoning, philosophy, etc.

Whether (as some phantasticall refyners of phylosophy will needes perswade vs) hell is nothing but error, and that none but fooles and idiots and mechanicall men, that haue no learning, shall be damnd. Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 66.

No men see less of the truth of things than these great refiners upon incidents, who are so wonderfully subtle and over wise in their conceptions. Addison.

4†. One who indulges in excessive compliment; one who is over-civil; a flatterer.

The worst was, our guilded refiners with their golden promises made all men their slaues in hope of recompences. Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 169.

For these people have fallen into a needless and endless way of multiplying ceremonies, which have been extremely troublesome to those who practise them, and insupportable to every body else; insomuch that wise men are often more uneasy at the over civility of these refiners than they could possibly be in the conversation of peasants or mechanics. Swift, Good Manners.

5. An apparatus for refining; specifically, in England, a gas-purifier.

refinery (rē-fī′nėr-i), n.; pl. refineries (-iz). [< refine + -ery. Cf. F. raffinerie, a refinery, < raffiner, refine: see refine.] A place or establishment where some substance, as petroleum, is refined; specifically, in metal., a place where metals are refined. See refine and finery[2].

refit (rē-fit′), v. [< re- + fit[1], v. Partly due to ME. refeten, repair: see refete.] I. trans. 1. To fit or prepare again; restore after damage or decay; repair: as, to refit ships of war.

Permit our ships a shelter on your shores,
Refitted from your woods with planks and oars.
Dryden, Æneid, i. 777.

We landed, in order to refit our vessels and store ourselves with provisions. Addison, Frozen Words.

2. To fit out or provide anew.

II. intrans. To repair damages, especially damages of ships.

Having received some Damage by a Storm, we . . . put in here to refit before we could adventure to go farther. Dampier, Voyages, I. 418.

At each place [Tampa Bay and Pensacola Bay] we have a railroad terminus, while at the latter harbor are ample means for refitting. Jour. of Mil. Service Inst., X. 586.

refit (rē-fit′), n. [< refit, v.] The repairing or renovating of what is damaged or worn out; specifically, the repair of a ship: as, the vessel came in for refit.

refitment (rē-fit′ment), n. [< refit + -ment.] The act of refitting.

refl. An abbreviation of reflexive.

reflairt, n. [< ME.; as re- + flair.] An odor.

ȝif hit watz semly on to sene,
A fayre reflayr ȝet fro hit flot,
Ther wonys that worthyly I wot & wene.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), i. 46.

reflairt, v. i. [ME. reflaren; < reflair, n.] To arise, as an odor.

Haill! floscampy, and flower vyrgynall,
The odour of thy goodnes reflars to vs all.
York Plays, p. 444.

reflame (rē-flām′), v. i. [< re- + flame.] To blaze again; burst again into flame.

Stamp out the fire, or this
Will smoulder and re-flame, and burn the throne
Where you should sit with Philip.
Tennyson, Queen Mary, i. 5.

reflect (rē-flekt′), v. [< OF. reflecter, F. refléter (= Sp. reflectar, reflejar), reflect; vernacularly, OF. reflechir, bend back, F. réfléchir, reflect, etc., = Pr. Sp. Pg. reflectir = It. riflettere, reflettere, reflect; < L. reflectere, bend backward, < re-, back, + flectere, bend: see flection.] I. trans. 1. To bend back; turn back; cast back; throw back again.

Reflect I not on thy baseness court-contempt?
Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 758.

And dazled with this greater light, I would reflect mine eyes to that reflexion of this light.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 13.

Let me mind the reader to reflect his eye upon other quotations. Fuller.

Do you reflect that Guilt upon me?
Congreve, Way of the World, ii. 3.

2. Hence, figuratively, to bend the will of; persuade. [Rare.]

Such rites beseem ambassadors, and Nestor urgèd these,
That their most honours might reflect enraged Œacides.
Chapman, Iliad, ix. 180. (Davies.)

3. To cause to return or to throw off after striking or falling on any surface, and in accordance with certain physical laws: as, to reflect light, heat, or sound; incident and reflected rays. See reflection, 2.

Then, grim in arms, with hasty vengeance flies,
Arms that reflect a radiance through the skies.
Pope, Iliad, xv. 157.

Like a wave of water which is sent up against a seawall, and which reflects itself back along the sea.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 40.

4. To give back an image or likeness of; mirror.

Nature is the glass reflecting God,
As by the sea reflected is the sun.
Young, Night Thoughts, ix. 1007.

Heav'n reflected in her face. Cowper, A Comparison.

The vast bosom of the Hudson was like an unruffled mirror, reflecting the golden splendor of the heavens.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 344.

Among the lower forms of life there is but little variation among the units; the one reflects the other, and species are founded upon differences that are only determined by using the micrometer.
Amer. Nat., June, 1890, p. 578.

II. intrans. 1. To bend or turn back; be reflected.

Let thine eyes
Reflect upon thy soul, and there behold
How loathèd black it is.
Beau. and Fl., Captain, iv. 5.

Not any thing that shall Reflect injurious to yourself.
Shirley, Love's Cruelty, i. 1.

2. To throw back light, heat, sound, etc.; give reflections; return rays or beams: as, a reflecting mirror or gem.

She lifts the coffer-lids that close his eyes,
Where, lo, two lamps, burnt out, in darkness lies;
Two glasses, where herself herself beheld
A thousand times, and now no more reflect.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 1130.

3. To throw or turn back the thoughts upon something; think or consider seriously; revolve matters in the mind, especially in relation to conduct; ponder or meditate.

Who saith, Who could such ill events expect?
With shame on his own counsels doth reflect.
Sir J. Denham, Prudence.

Content if hence the unlearn'd their wants may view,
The learn'd reflect on what before they knew.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 740.

We cannot be said to reflect upon any external object except in so far as that object has been previously perceived, and its image become part and parcel of our intellectual furniture. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., x.

Let boys and girls in our schools be taught to think; let them not be drilled so much in remembering as in reflecting. J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 137.

4. To bring reproach; cast censure or blame: followed by on or upon.

This kind of language reflects with the same ignominy upon all the Protestant Reformations that have bin since Luther. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xiiii.

She could not bear to hear Charles reflected on, notwithstanding their difference.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, i. 1.

5†. To shine.

Lord Saturnine; whose virtues will, I hope,
Reflect on Rome as Titan's rays on earth,
And ripen justice. Shak., Tit. And., i. 1. 226.

=Syn. 3. To consider, meditate upon, etc. (see list under contemplate), cogitate, ruminate, study.

reflect†, n. [< reflect, v.] A reflection. [Rare.]

Would you in blindnesse live? these raies of myne
Give that reflect by which your Beauties shine.
Heywood, Apollo and Daphne (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, [VI. 289).

reflected (rē-flek′ted), p. a. 1. Cast or thrown back: as, reflected light.—2. In anat., turned back upon itself. See reflection, 10.—3. In entom., turned upward or back: as, a reflected margin.—4. In her., same as reflexed, 3.—Flected and reflected. See flected.—Reflected light, in painting, the subdued light which falls on objects that are in shadow, and serves to bring out their forms. It is treated as reflected from some object on which the light falls directly, whether seen in the picture or supposed to influence it from without.

reflectent† (rē-flek′tent), a. [< L. reflecten(t-)s, ppr. of reflectere, reflect: see reflect.] 1. Bending or flying back; reflected.

The ray descendent, and the ray reflectent.
Sir K. Digby, Nature of Man's Soul. (Latham.)

2. Capable of reflecting.

When light passes through such bodies, it finds at the very entrance of them such resistences, where it passes, as serve it for a reflecting body, and yet such a reflectent body as hinders not the passage through, but only from being a straight line with the line incident.
Sir K. Digby, Of Bodies, xiii.

reflectible (rē-flek′ti-bl), a. [< reflect + -ible. Cf. reflexible.] Capable of being reflected or thrown back.

★reflecting (rē-flek′ting), p. a. 1. Throwing back light, heat, etc., as a mirror or other polished surface.

A perfectly reflecting body is one which cannot absorb any ray. Polished silver suggests such a body.
Tait, Light, § 307.

2. Given to reflection; thoughtful; meditative; provident: as, a reflecting mind.

No reflecting man can ever wish to adulterate manly piety (the parent of all that is good in the world) with mummery and parade.
Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, iii.

Reflecting circle, an instrument for measuring altitudes and angular distances, constructed on the principle of the sextant, the graduations, however, being continued completely round the limb of the circle.—Reflecting dial. See dial.—Reflecting galvanometer. See Thomson's mirror galvanometer, under galvanometer.—Reflecting goniometer. See goniometer.—Reflecting lamp, a lamp with an upper reflector so arranged as to throw downward those rays of light which tend upward.—Reflecting level. (a) An instrument for determining a horizontal direction by looking at the reflection of an object at a distance. Thus, in Mariotte's level, the level is determined by bisecting the distance between the direct image of an object and its reflection in a sort of artificial horizon. In Cassini's level, a telescope hangs vertically, carrying before its object-glass a plane mirror inclined 45° to the line of sight. (b) An instrument in which a slow-moving bubble is viewed by reflection, so that the image of the middle of it can be seen by the side of the direct image of a distant object. Such are Abney's and Locke's levels, used by topographers. See Locke level, under level[1].—Reflecting microscope. See microscope.—Reflecting power, the power possessed by any surface of throwing off a greater or less proportion of incident heat. This power is a maximum for the polished metals and a minimum for a surface of lampblack; it is the reciprocal of the absorptive (and radiating) power.—Reflecting quadrant. See quadrant, 4.—Reflecting sight, in firearms, a reflecting surface placed at such an angle as to reflect to the eye light from one direction only. E. H. Knight.—Reflecting telescope. See telescope.

reflectingly (rē-flek′ting-li), adv. 1. With reflection.—2. With censure; reproachfully; censoriously. [Rare.]

A great indiscretion in the archbishop of Dublin, who applied a story out of Tacitus very reflectingly on Mr. Harley. Swift, Journal to Stella, xx.

★reflection, reflexion (rē-flek′shon), n. [< ME. reflexion, reflexioun, < OF. reflexion, F. réflexion, réflection = Pr. reflexio = Sp. reflexión = Pg. reflexão = It. riflessione, < LL. reflexio(n-), a bending or turning back, < L. reflectere, pp. reflexus, bend back, reflect: see reflect.] 1. A bending back; a turning.

Crooked Erimanthus wyth hys manye turnynges and reflexions is consumed by the inhabytours with waterynge their ground. J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, fol. 232.

2. The act of reflecting, or the state of being reflected; specifically, in physics, the change of direction which a ray of light, radiant heat, or sound experiences when it strikes upon a surface and is thrown back into the same medium from which it approached. Reflection follows two laws, viz.—(1) the angle of reflection is equal to the angle of incidence; and (2) the reflected and incident rays are in the same plane with a normal to the surface. If DE represents the surface of a mirror and CB the incident ray, then HBC is the angle of incidence, and HBA, equal to it, is the angle of reflection. This applies alike to sound, to radiant energy (heat and light), and also to a perfectly elastic body bounding from a perfectly elastic rigid surface. The plane passing through the perpendicular to the reflecting surface at the point of incidence and the path of the reflected ray of light or heat is called the plane of reflection. (See mirror, echo.) For the total reflection of rays when the critical angle is passed, see refraction.

Lights, by clear reflection multiplied
From many a mirror. Cowper, Task, iv. 268.

Reflection always accompanies refraction; and if one of these disappear, the other will disappear also.
Tyndall, Light and Elect., p. 39.

3. That which is produced by being reflected; an image given back from a reflecting surface.

As the sun in water we can bear,
Yet not the sun, but his reflection, there.
Dryden, Eleonora, l. 137.

Mountain peak and village spire
Retain reflection of his fire.
Scott, Rokeby, v. 1.

The mind is like a double mirror, in which reflexions of self within self multiply themselves till they are undistinguishable. J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 185.

4. The act of shining. [Rare.]

As whence the sun 'gins his reflection
Shipwrecking storms and direful thunders break.
Shak., Macbeth, i. 2. 25.

5. The turning of thought back upon past experiences or ideas; attentive or continued consideration; meditation; contemplation; deliberation: as, a man much given to reflection.

Education begins the gentleman; but reading, good company, and reflection must finish him.
Locke. (Allibone.)

Where under heav'n is pleasure more pursued,
Or where does cold reflection less intrude?
Cowper, Expostulation, l. 8.

6. A mental process resulting from attentive or continued consideration; thought or opinion after deliberation.

A gentleman whose conversation and friendship furnish me still with some of the most agreeable reflections that result from my travels.
Bruce, Source of the Nile, Int., p. xxii.

He made very wise reflections and observations upon all I said. Swift, Gulliver's Travels, ii. 3.

"I am sorry, but I must do it; I am driven to it; every body has to do it; we must look at things as they are;" these are the reflections which lead men into violations of morality. J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 57.

7. A kind of self-consciousness resulting from an outward perception, whether directly or indirectly; the exercise of the internal sense; the perception of a modification of consciousness; the faculty of distinguishing between a datum of sense and a product of reason; the consideration of the limitations of knowledge, ignorance, and error, and of other unsatisfactory states as leading to knowledge of self; the discrimination between the subjective and objective aspects of feelings. The Latin word reflexio was first used as a term of psychology by Thomas Aquinas, who seems to intend no optical metaphor, but to conceive that consciousness is turned back upon itself by the reaction of the object of outward perception. According to Aquinas, pure thought in itself can know nothing of singulars, or particular things; but in perception there is a peculiar sense of reaction or reciprocation which he calls reflection, and this first makes us aware of the existence of actual singulars and also of thought as being an action; and this, according to him, is the first self-consciousness. Scotus accepted reflection, not as affording the first knowledge of singulars, but as a perception of what passes in the mind, and thus the original meaning of the term was modified. Walter Burleigh, who died in 1337, affords an illustration of this when he says that the thing without is apprehended before the passion which is in the soul, because the thing without is apprehended directly, and the passion of the soul only indirectly, by reflection. Ramus, in his dissertation on reflection, defines it as "the successive direction of the attention to several partial perceptions." A still further change of meaning had come about when Goclenius, in 1613, defined reflection as "the inward action of the soul, by which it recognizes both itself and its acts and ideas." The importance of the word in the English school of philosophy (Berkeley, Hume, etc.) may be said to be due entirely to its use by Locke, who explains it as follows:

The other fountain from which experience furnisheth the understanding with ideas is the perception of the operations of our own mind within us, as it is employed about the ideas it has got; which operations, when the soul comes to reflect on and consider, do furnish the understanding with another set of ideas, which could not be had from things without; and such are perception, thinking, doubting, believing, reasoning, knowing, willing, and all the different actings of our own minds; which we being conscious of, and observing in ourselves, do from these receive into our understandings as distinct ideas as we do from bodies affecting our senses. This source of ideas every man has wholly in himself; and though it be not sense, as having nothing to do with external objects, yet it is very like it, and might properly enough be called internal sense. But as I call the other sensation, so I call this reflection, the ideas it affords being such only as the mind gets by reflecting on its own operations within itself. By reflection, then, in the following part of this discourse, I would be understood to mean that notice which the mind takes of its own operations, and the manner of them; by reason whereof there come to be ideas of these operations in the understanding.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. i. 4.

Reid endeavored to revive the Ramist use of the word, for which he is condemned by Hamilton. Kant, in his use of the term, returns to something like the Thomist view, for he makes it a mode of consciousness by which we are made aware whether knowledge is sensuous or not. Kant makes use of the term reflection to denote a mode of consciousness in which we distinguish between the relations of concepts and the corresponding relations of the objects of the concepts. Thus, two concepts may be different, and yet it may be conceived that their objects are identical; or two concepts may be identical, and yet it may be conceived that their objects (say, two drops of water) are different. Mr. Shadworth Hodgson, in his "Philosophy of Reflection," 1878, uses the term to denote one of three fundamental modes of consciousness, namely that in which the objective and subjective aspects of what is present are discriminated without being separated as person and thing.

The faculty by which I place the comparison of representations in general by the side of the faculty to which they belong, and by which I determine whether they are compared with each other as belonging to the pure understanding or to sensuous intuition, I call transcendental reflection.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Müller, p. 261.

The particular reflection that states of consciousness are things, or that the Subject is its Objects, constitutes . . . the reflective mode of consciousness. . . . Perception . . . is the rudimentary function in reflection as well as in primary consciousness; and reflective conception is a derivative from it. S. Hodgson, Philosophy of Reflection, i. 2, § 3.

8†. That which corresponds to and reflects something in the mind or in the nature of any one.

As if folkes complexiouns [constitutions, temperaments] Make hem dreme of reflexiouns.
Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 22.

9. Reproach cast; censure; criticism.

To suppose any Books of Scripture to be lost which contained any necessary Points of Faith is a great Reflexion on Divine Providence. Stillingfleet, Sermons, III. ii.

He bore all their weakness and prejudice, and returned not reflection for reflection.
Penn, Rise and Progress of Quakers, v.

10. In anat.: (a) Duplication; the folding of a part, as a membrane, upon itself; a bending back or complete deflection. (b) That which is reflected; a fold: as, a reflection of the peritoneum forming a mesentery.—11. In zoöl., a play of color which changes in different lights: as, the reflections of the iridescent plumage of a humming-bird. Coues.—Axis of reflection. See axis[1].—Logical reflection. See logical.—Point of reflection. See point[1].—Total reflection. See refraction[1].
=Syn. 5. Rumination, cogitation.—6. See remark[1], n.

reflection† (rē-flek'shon), v. t. [< reflection, n.] To reflect. [Rare.]

But, reflectioning apart, thou seest, Jack, that her plot is beginning to work.
Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, IV. xxi.

reflectionist (rē-flek'shon-ist), n. [< reflection + -ist.] An adherent of Shadworth Hodgson's philosophy of reflection. The doctrine is that a power of perceiving the relations of subjective and objective aspects and elements is the highest mode of consciousness.

★reflective (rē-flek'tiv), a. [= F. réflectif; as reflect + -ive. Cf. reflexive.] 1. Throwing back rays or images; giving reflections; reflecting.

In the reflective stream the sighing bride Viewing her charms impair'd. Prior.

A mirror . . . of the dimensions of a muffin, and about as reflective. L. M. Alcott, Hospital Sketches, p. 62.

2. Taking cognizance of the operations of the mind; exercising thought or reflection; capable of exercising thought or judgment.

Forc'd by reflective Reason, I confess That human Science is uncertain Guess.
Prior, Solomon, i.

His perceptive and reflective faculties . . . thus acquired a precocious and extraordinary development.
Motley. (Webster.)

3. Having a tendency to or characterized by reflection.

The Greeks are not reflective, but perfect in their senses and in their health, with the finest physical organization in the world. Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 23.

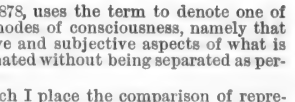
Several persons having the true dramatic feeling . . . were overborne by the reflective, idyllic fashion which then began to prevail in English verse.
Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 2.



4. Devoted to reflection; containing reflections. [Rare.]—5. In gram., reflexive.—Reflective faculties, in phren., a division of the intellectual faculties, comprising the two so-called organs of comparison and causality.—Reflective judgment, in the Kantian terminology, that kind of judgment that mounts from the particular to the general.

reflectively (rē-flek'tiv-li), adv. In a reflective manner; by reflection, in any sense of that word.

reflectiveness (rē-flek'tiv-nes), n. The state or quality of being reflective.

The meditative lyric appeals to a profounder reflectiveness, which is feelingly alive to the full pathos of life, and to all the mystery of sorrow.
J. C. Shairp, Aspects of Poetry, p. 118.

reflectoire (ref-lek-twor'), n. [< F. réflectoire; as reflect + -ory.] A geometrical surface whose form is that of the appearance of a horizontal plane seen through a layer of water with air above it.—Reflectoire curve, a curve which is a central vertical section of the surface called a reflectoire. It is a curve of the fourth order and sixth class, having a tacnode on the surface of the water at infinity, and a double point at the eye.

Reflectoire.

reflector (rē-flek'tor), n. [= F. réflecteur; as reflect + -or[1].] 1. One who reflects or considers.

There is scarce anything that nature has made, or that men do suffer, whence the devout reflector cannot take an occasion of an aspiring meditation. Boyle, On Colours.

2. One who casts reflections; a censurer.

This answerer has been pleased to find fault with about a dozen passages; . . . the reflector is entirely mistaken, and forces interpretations which never once entered into the writer's head. Swift, Tale of a Tub, Apol.

3. That which reflects. Specifically—(a) A polished surface of metal or any other suitable material, used for the purpose of reflecting rays of light, heat, or sound in any required direction. Reflectors may be either plane or curvilinear; of the former the common mirror is a familiar example. Curvilinear reflectors admit of a great variety of forms, according to the purposes for which they are employed: they may be either convex or concave, spherical, elliptical, parabolic, or hyperbolic, etc. The parabolic form is perhaps the most generally serviceable, being used for many purposes of illumination as well as for various highly important philosophical instruments. Its property is to reflect, in parallel lines, all rays diverging from the focus of the parabola, and conversely. A series of parabolic mirrors, by which the rays from one or more lamps were reflected in a parallel beam, so as to render the light visible at a great distance, was the arrangement generally employed in lighthouses previous to the invention of the Fresnel lamp, or dioptric light. The annexed cut is a section of a ship's lantern fitted with an Argand lamp and parabolic reflector. a a is the reflector, b the lamp, situated in the focus of the polished concave paraboloid, c the oil-cistern, d the outer frame of the lantern, and e the chimney for the escape of the products of combustion. (b) A reflecting telescope, the speculum of which is an example of the converse application of the parabolic reflector, the parallel rays proceeding from a distant body being in this case concentrated into the focus of the reflector. See telescope, and cut under catoptric.

Parabolic Reflector.

Reflectors have been made as large as six feet in aperture, the greatest being that of Lord Rosse.
Newcomb and Holden, Astron., p. 68.

Double-cone reflector, a form of ventilating-reflector, connected with a chandelier or a similar device for supplying artificial light: used in the ceiling of a hall or other place of public assembly.—Parabolic reflector, a reflector of paraboloidal shape: used either for concentrating rays upon an object at the focus, as in the microscope, or, with a light at the focus, for reflecting the rays in parallel lines to form a beam of light, as in lighthouse and some other lanterns. See def. 3, and cut above.

reflectory (rē-flek'tō-ri), a. [< reflect + -ory.] Capable of being reflected.

reflet (F. pron. rē-flā'), n. [F., reflection, < L. reflectere, reflect: see reflect.] 1. Brilliancy of surface, as in metallic luster or glaze on pottery, especially when having an iridescent or many-colored flash.

A full crimson tint with a brilliant metallic reflet or iridescence. J. C. Robinson, S. K. Spec. Ex., p. 421.

2. A piece of pottery having such a glaze, especially a tile: sometimes used attributively.

There is in this place an enormous reflet tile. . . . The reflet tiles in which a copper tint is prominent.
S. G. W. Benjamin, Persia and the Persians, pp. 285, 287.

Reflet métallique. See metallic luster, under luster[2], 2.—Reflet nacré, a luster having an iridescent appearance like that of mother-of-pearl.

reflex (rē-fleks'), v. t. [< L. reflexus, pp. of reflectere, reflect: see reflect.] 1. To bend back; turn back.

A dog lay, . . . his head reflext upon his tail.
J. Gregory, Posthuma, p. 118.

2†. To reflect; cast or throw, as light; let shine.

May never glorious sun reflex his beams
Upon the country where you make abode.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 4. 87.

★reflex (rē'fleks or rē-fleks'), a. [< L. reflexus, pp. of reflectere, reflect: see reflect.] 1. Turned or turned backward; having a backward direction; reflective; reactive.

A reflex act of the soul, or the turning of the intellectual eye inward upon its own actions. Sir M. Hale.

The order and beauty of the inanimate parts of the world, the discernible ends of them, do evince by a reflex argument that it is the workmanship, not of blind mechanism or blinder chance, but of an intelligent and benign agent.
Bentley.

2. In painting, illuminated by light reflected from another part of the same picture. See reflected light, under reflected.—3. In biol., bent back; reflexed.—Reflex action, motion, or movement, in physiol., those comparatively simple actions of the nervous system in which a stimulus is transmitted along sensory nerves to a nerve-center, from which again it is reflected along efferent nerves to call into play some muscular, glandular, or other activity. These actions are performed involuntarily, and often unconsciously, as the contraction of the pupil of the eye when exposed to strong light.

There is another action, namely, that of aggregation, which in certain cases may be called reflex, and it is the only known instance in the vegetable kingdom.
Darwin, Insectiv. Plants, p. 242.

Reflex movements have slightly more of the appearance of a purposive character than automatic movements, though this is in many cases very vague and ill-defined.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 594.

Reflex angle. See angle[3], 1.—Reflex epilepsy, epilepsy dependent on some peripheral irritation, as a nasal polypus.—Reflex excitation, muscular movement produced by the irritation of an efferent nerve.—Reflex neuralgia, neuralgia dependent on a source of irritation in some more or less distant part.—Reflex paralysis. See paralysis.—Reflex perception. (a) Consciousness of our states of mind; reflection; internal sense; self-consciousness. (b) A sensation supposed to be produced by the irritation of an efferent or motor nerve: but the existence of the phenomenon is denied.—Reflex science, the science of science; logic.—Reflex sense, the power of perceiving relations among objects of imagination. This term, in the form reflected sense, was introduced by Shaftesbury, with whom, however, it merely means secondary sensation, or a sensation produced by ideas. Hutcheson modified the meaning and form of the expression.—Reflex theory, any one of the theories proposed to account for or explain the phenomena of reflex action in physiology.—Reflex vision, vision by means of reflected light, as from mirrors.—Reflex zenith-tube, an instrument used at Greenwich to observe the transit of γ Draconis in an artificial horizon, that star coming nearly to the zenith at that observatory.

reflex (rē′fleks, formerly also rē-fleks′), n. [< F. réflexe = Sp. reflejo = Pg. reflexo = It. riflesso, a reflex, reflection, < L. reflexus, a bending back, a recess, < reflectere, pp. reflexus, bend back: see reflect, reflex, v.] 1. Reflection; an image produced by reflection.

Yon grey is not the morning's eye,
'Tis but the pale reflex of Cynthia's brow.
Shak., R. and J., iii. 5. 20.

2. A mere copy; an adapted form: as, a Middle Latin reflex of an Old French word.—3. Light reflected from an illuminated surface to one in shade; hence, in painting, the illumination of one body or a part of it by light reflected from another body represented in the same piece. See reflected light, under reflected.

Yet, since your light hath once enlumind me,
With my reflex yours shall encreased be.
Spenser, Sonnets, lxvi.

4. Same as reflex action (which see, under reflex, a.).

These reflexes are caused by mechanical irritation of the pleural surface. Medical News, LII. 496.

Abdominal reflex. See abdominal.—Cornea-reflex, winking on irritation of the cornea.—Cremasteric reflex, contraction of the cremaster muscle on stimulation of the skin on the inside of the thigh.—Deep reflexes, reflexes developed by percussion of tendons or bones, as the knee-jerk.—Epigastric reflex, irritation of the skin in the fifth or sixth intercostal space on the side of the chest, causing a contraction of the highest fibers of the rectus abdominis muscle.—Gluteal reflex, contraction of the gluteal muscles, due to irritation of the skin of the nates. The center is in the spinal cord in the region of the fourth or fifth lumbar nerve.—Knee-reflex. Same as knee-jerk.—Paradoxical pupilary reflex, the dilatation of the pupil on stimulation of the retina by light. Also called paradoxical pupilary reaction.—Patellar-tendon reflex. Same as knee-jerk.—Plantar reflex, the reflex action producing movements in toes and foot evoked by tickling the sole of the foot. Also called sole-reflex.—Psychogalvanic reflex, in exp. psychol. and psychopathol., a change in the electrical conductivity of the tissues of the living body, registered by a galvanometer (with or without the intervention of a constant electric current) as a reflex response to the incidence upon the organism of sensory or psychical stimuli. Also called psychophysical galvanic reflex; psychogalvanic reaction; the galvanic phenomenon.—Pupilary light-reflex, the contraction of the pupil when light falls on the retina. The action is bilateral, both pupils contracting though only one retina is stimulated. The paradoxical pupilary reflex or reaction is the dilatation of the pupil when light falls on the retina: it occurs in rare abnormal states.—Pupilary skin-reflex, the dilatation of the pupil on more or less intense stimulation of the skin. The motor path is through the cervical sympathetic.—Reflex-center, the collection of nerve-cells or nucleus in the brain in which the afferent sensory impulse becomes changed to the efferent motor impulse.—Scapular reflex, contraction of the posterior axillary fold, due to irritation of the skin in the interscapular region.—Sole reflex. Same as plantar reflex.—Spinal reflexes, such reflex actions as have their centers in the spinal cord.—Superficial reflexes, such reflexes as are developed from skin stimulation, as the plantar, cremasteric, abdominal, or other reflexes.—Tendon-reflex. Same as myotatic contraction (which see, under myotatic).

reflexed (rē-flekst′), a. [< reflex, v., + -ed[2].] 1. In bot., bent abruptly backward: said of petals, sepals, leaf-veins, etc.—2. In zoöl., bent back or up; reflex.—3. In her., curved twice: same as bowed, but applied especially to the chain secured to the collar of a beast, which often takes an S-curve. Also reflected.—Reflexed antennæ, antennæ carried constantly bent back over the head and body.—Reflexed ovipositor, an ovipositor which is turned back so as to lie on the upper surface of the abdomen, as in certain Chalcididæ.

reflexibility (rē-flek-si-bil′i-ti), n. [= F. réflexibilité = Sp. reflexibilidad = Pg. reflexibilidade = It. reflessibilità; as reflexible + -ity (see -bility).] The quality of being reflexible, or capable of being reflected: as, the reflexibility of light-rays.

Reflexibility of Rays is their disposition to be reflected or turned back into the same Medium from any other Medium upon whose surface they fall.
Newton, Opticks, I. i. 3.

reflexible (rē-flek′si-bl), a. [= F. réflexible = Sp. reflexible = Pg. reflexivel = It. reflessibile; as reflex, v., + -ible (cf. flexible).] Capable of being reflected or thrown back.

Rays are more or less reflexible which are turned back more or less easily. Newton, Opticks, I. i. 3.

reflexion, n. See reflection.

reflexity (rē-flek′si-ti), n. [< reflex, a., + -ity.] The capacity of being reflected. [Rare.]

reflexive (rē-flek′siv), a. and n. [< OF. reflexif, F. réflexif = Pr. reflexiu = Sp. Pg. reflexivo = It. reflessivo, riflessivo, < L. reflexus, pp. of reflectere, bend backward: see reflect.] I. a. 1. Reflective; bending or turning backward; having respect to something past.

Assurance reflexive . . . cannot be a divine faith.
Hammond, Pract. Catechism, i. § 3.

The reflexive power of flame is nearly the same as that of tracing-paper. A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 413.

2. Capable of reflection; reflective.

In general, brute animals are of such a nature as is devoid of that free and reflexive reason which is requisite to acquired art and consultation.
Dr. H. More, Immortal. of Soul, iii. 13.

3†. Casting or containing a reflection or censure.

I would fain know what man almost there is that does not resent an ugly reflexive word. South, Sermons, X. vi.

Reflexive verb, in gram., a verb of which the action turns back upon the subject or which has for its direct object a pronoun representing its agent or subject: as, I bethought myself; the witness forswore himself. Pronouns of this class are called reflexive pronouns, and in English are generally compounds with self; though such examples as he bethought him how he should act also occur.

I do repent me, as it is an evil,
And take the shame with joy.
Shak., M. for M., ii. 3. 35.

II. n. A reflexive verb or pronoun.

What I wish to say is, that the reflexive which serves to express the passive is a causal reflexive.
J. Hadley, Essays, p. 209.

reflexively (rē-flek′siv-li), adv. 1. In a reflexive manner; in a direction backward: as, to meditate reflexively upon one's course.—2. In gram., after the manner of a reflexive verb.—3†. Reflectingly; slightingly; with censure.

Ay, but he spoke slightly and reflexively of such a lady.
South, Sermons, VI. iii.

reflexiveness (rē-flek′siv-nes), n. The state or quality of being reflexive.

reflexly (rē′fleks-li or rē-fleks′li), adv. In a reflex manner.

reflexogenic (rē-flek-sō-jen′ik), a. [< L. reflexus, reflex (see reflex, a.), + -genus, producing: see -genic.] Producing an increased tendency to reflex motions.

reflow† (rē-flō′), n. [< re- + float, after F. reflot, reflux, ebb: see float.] A flowing back; reflux; ebb.

Of which kind we conceive the main float and reflow of the sea is, which is by consent of the universe as part of the diurnal motion. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 907.

reflorescence (rē-flō-res′ens), n. [< L. reflorescen(t-)s, ppr. of reflorescere, begin to bloom again, < re-, again, + florescere, begin to bloom: see flourish. Cf. reflourish.] A blossoming anew; reflowering.

Nor can we, it is apprehended, peruse the account of the flowering rod of Aaron . . . without being led to reflect on the ascertainment of the Melchisedekian priesthood to the person of Christ, by the reflorescence of that mortal part which he drew from the stem of Jesse.
Horne, Works, IV. xvi.

reflourish (rē-flur′ish), v. i. [< OF. refleuriss-, stem of certain parts of refluriv, refloriv, refleurir, F. refleurir = It. rifiorire, < L. reflorere*, bloom again (cf. Sp. Pg. reflorecer, < L. reflorescere, begin to bloom again), < re-, again, + florere, bloom: see flourish.] To revive, flourish, or bloom anew.

For Israel to reflourish, and take new life by the influxes of the Holy Spirit. Waterland, Works, III. 421.

reflow (rē-flō′), v. i. [< re- + flow, v.] To flow back; ebb.

When any one blessed spirit rejoices, his joy goes round the whole society; and then all their rejoicings in his joy reflow upon and swell and multiply it.
J. Scott, Christian Life, I. iii. § 3.

reflow (rē-flō′), n. [< reflow, v.] A reflux; a flowing back; refluence; ebb.

reflower (rē-flou′ėr), v. [< re- + flower, v. Cf. reflorescence, reflourish.] I. intrans. To flower again.

II. trans. To cause to flower or bloom again.

Her footing makes the ground all fragrant-fresh;
Her sight re-flowres th' Arabian Wildernes.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Magnificence.

reflowing (rē-flō′ing), n. A flowing back; reflux.

By . . . working upon our spirits they can moderate as they please the violence of our passions, which are nothing but the flowings and reflowings of our spirits to and fro from our hearts.
J. Scott, Christian Life, II. vii. § 10.

refluence (ref′lö-ens), n. [< refluen(t) + -ce.] 1. A flowing back; reflux; ebb.—2. A backward movement.

Nay but, my friends, one hornpipe further, a refluence back, and two doubles forward.
Greene, James the Fourth, iv.

refluency (ref′lö-en-si), n. [As refluence (see -cy).] Same as refluence.

All things sublunary move continually in an interchangeable flowing and refluencie.
W. Montague, Devoute Essays, I. vi. 2.

refluent (ref′lö-ent), a. [= F. refluant = Sp. Pg. refluente = It. rifluente, < L. refluen(t-)s, ppr. of refluere (> It. rifluire = Sp. Pg. refluir = F. refluer), flow back, < L. re-, back, + fluere, flow: see fluent.] Flowing or surging back; ebbing: as, the refluent tide.

And refluent through the pass of fear
The battle's tide was poured.
Scott, L. of the L., vi. 18.

And in haste the refluent ocean
Fled away from the shore, and left the line of the sand-beach Covered with waifs of the tide.
Longfellow, Evangeline, i. 5.

refluous† (ref′lö-us), a. [= It. refluo, < L. refluus, flowing back, < refluere, flow back: see refluent.] Flowing back; refluent; ebbing.

The stream of Jordan, south of their going over, was not supplied with any reciprocall or refluous tide out of the Dead Sea. Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. i. 17. (Davies.) reflux (rē′fluks), n. [< reflux = Sp. reflujo = F. Pg. refluxo = It. riflusso, < ML. refluxus*, a flowing back, ebb, < L. refluere, pp. refluxus, flow back: see refluent.] A flowing back: as, the flux and reflux of the tides.

If man were out of the world, who were then to search out the causes of the flux and reflux of the sea, and the hidden virtue of the magnet?
Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism, ii. 12.

There will be disputes among its neighbours, and some of these will prevail at one time and some at another, in the perpetual flux and reflux of human affairs.
Bolingbroke, The Occasional Writer, No. 2.

The old miracle of the Greek proverb, . . . which adopted the reflux of rivers towards their fountains as the liveliest type of the impossible. De Quincey, Homer, iii.

reflux-valve (rē′fluks-valv), n. An automatic valve designed to prevent reflux; a back-pressure valve. E. H. Knight.

refocillate† (rē-fos′i-lāt), v. t. [< LL. refocillatus, pp. of refocillare (> It. rifocillare, refocillare = Sp. refocilar = Pg. refocillar), warm into life again, revive, revivify, < L. re-, again, + focillare, focillari, revive by warmth, cherish, < focus, a hearth, fireplace: see focus.] To warm into life again; revive; refresh; reinvigorate.

The first view thereof did even refocillate my spirits.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 110.

refocillation† (rē-fos-i-lā′shon), n. [= Sp. refocilación = Pg. refocillação, < LL. as if refocillatio(n-)*, < refocillare, refocillate: see refocillate.] The act of refocillating or imparting new vigor; restoration of strength by refreshment; also, that which causes such restoration.

Marry, sir, some precious cordial, some costly refocillation, a composure comfortable and restorative.
Middleton, Mad World, iii. 2.

refold (rē-fōld′), v. t. [< re- + fold[1].] To fold again.

refolded (rē-fōl′ded), a. In entom., replicate: noting the wings when fluted or folded longitudinally, like a fan, and then turned back on themselves, as in the earwigs.

refoot (rē-fůt′), v. t. [< re- + foot.] To repair by supplying with a new foot, as a boot or a stocking.

reforest (rē-for'est), v. t. [< re- + forest.] To replant with forest-trees; restore to the condition of forest or woodland; reafforest.

Within the last twenty years, France has reforested about two hundred and fifty thousand acres of mountain-lands. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXII. 228.

The reforesting of the denuded areas in the lower hills. Nature, XXXVII. 467.

reforestation (rē-for-es-tā'shọn), n. [< reforest + -ation.] The act or process of reforesting; replanting with forest-trees.

Quite recently districts have been enclosed for reforestation, and the eucalyptus and other trees have been planted. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 93.

reforge (rē-fôrj'), v. t. [= F. reforger; as re- + forge.] To forge or form again; hence, to fabricate or fashion anew; make over.

The kyngdome of God receiueth none but suche as be reforged and chaunged according to this paterne. J. Udall, On Luke xviii.

reforger (rē-fôr'jėr), n. One who reforges; one who makes over.

But Christe, beyng a newe reforger of the olde lawe, in stede of burnte offreyng did substitute charitee. J. Udall, On Luke xxiv.

reform (rē-fôrm'), v. [Early mod. E. also refourm; < ME. reformen, refourmen (= D. reformeren = G. reformiren = Sw. reformera = Dan. reformere), < OF. reformer, refurmer, refformer, reffourmer, form anew, reform, rectify, etc., F. reformer, form anew, réformer, reform, rectify, correct, reduce, put on half-pay, = Pr. Sp. Pg. reformar = It. riformare, reform, < L. reformare, form anew, remodel, remold, transform, metamorphose, change, alter, amend, reform (as manners or discipline), < re-, again, + formare, form: see form.] I. trans. 1. To form again or anew; remake; reconstruct; renew. [In this, the original sense, and in the following sense, usually with a full pronunciation of the prefix, and sometimes written distinctively re-form.]

Then carppez to syr Gawan the knyȝt in the grene, "Refourme we oure forwardes [covenants], er we fyrre passe."
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 377.

And right so in the same forme,
In flesshe and bloud he shall reforme,
Whan time cometh, the quicke and dede.
Gower, Conf. Amant., ii.

Beholde the buyldynge of the towre; yf it be well I am contente, and yf ony thynge be amysse yt shall be refourmed after your deuyse.
Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., II. lxxxiii.

She saw the bees lying dead in heaps. . . . She could render back no life; she could set not a muscle in motion; she could re-form not a filament of a wing.
S. Judd, Margaret, i. 5.

Napoleon was humbled; the map of Europe was reformed on a plan which showed a respect for territorial rights, and a just recognition both of the earnings of force and of the growth of ideas.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 237.

2. To restore to the natural or regular order or arrangement: as, to reform broken or scattered troops.

In accustoming officers to seek all opportunities for re-forming dispersed men at the earliest possible moment. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 354.

Then came the command to re-form the battalion.
The Century, XXXVII. 469.

3. To restore to a former and better state, or to bring from a bad to a good state; change from worse to better; improve by alteration, rearrangement, reconstruction, or abolition of defective parts or imperfect conditions, or by substitution of something better; amend; correct: as, to reform a profligate man; to reform corrupt manners or morals; to reform the corrupt orthography of English or French.

And now, forsooth, takes on him to reform
Some certain edicts, and some strait decrees
That lie too heavy on the commonwealth.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv. 3. 78.

In the Beginning of his Reign, he refined and reformed the Laws of the Realm. Baker, Chronicles, p. 56.

When Men have no mind to be reformed, they must have some Terms of Reproach to fasten upon those who go about to do it. Stillingfleet, Sermons, III. v.

Reforming men's conduct without reforming their natures is impossible. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 384.

4. To abandon, remove, or abolish for something better. [Rare.]

1 Play. I hope we have reformed that [bombastic acting] indifferently with us, sir.
Hamlet. O, reform it altogether.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2. 40.

5†. To mend, in a physical sense; repair.

He gave towardes the reforming of that church [St. Helen's] five hundred markes.
Stowe, Survey of London, p. 181.

6. To correct. [Rare.]

The prophet Esay also saith, "Who hath reformed the Spirit of the Lord, or who is of His council to teach Him?"
Becon, Works, ii. 39. (Davies.)

To reform an instrument, in law, to adjudge that it be read and taken differently from what it is expressed, as when it was drawn without correctly expressing the intent of the parties. = Syn. 3. Improve, Better, etc. (see amend), repair, reclaim, remodel.

II. intrans. 1. To form again; get into order or line again; resume order, as troops or a procession. [In this use treated as in I., 1, above.] —2. To abandon that which is evil or corrupt and return to that which is good; change from worse to better; be amended or redeemed.

Experience shows that the Turk never has reformed, and reason, arguing from experience, will tell us that the Turk never can reform. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 422.

reform (rē-fôrm'), n. [= D. reforme = G. Sw. Dan. reform; < F. réforme = Sp. Pg. reforma = It. riforma, reform; from the verb.] Any proceeding which either brings back a better order of things or reconstructs the present order to advantage; amendment of what is defective, vicious, depraved, or corrupt; a change from worse to better; reformation: as, to introduce reforms in sanitary matters; to be an advocate of reform.

A variety of schemes, founded in visionary and impracticable ideas of reform, were suddenly produced.
Pitt, Speech on Parliamentary Reform, May 7, 1783.

Great changes and new manners have occur'd,
And blest reforms. Cowper, Conversation, l. 804.

Our fervent wish, and we will add our sanguine hope, is that we may see such a reform of the House of Commons as may render its votes the express image of the opinion of the middle orders of Britain.
Macaulay, Utilitarian Theory of Government.

Revolution means merely transformation, and is accomplished when an entirely new principle is — either with force or without it — put in the place of an existing state of things. Reform, on the other hand, is when the principle of the existing state of things is continued, and only developed to more logical or just consequences. The means do not signify. A reform may be carried out by bloodshed, and a revolution in the profoundest tranquillity. Lassalle, quoted in Rae's Contemporary Socialism, p. 66.

Ballot reform, reform in the manner of voting in popular elections. Since about 1887 several of the United States have passed laws designed to promote secrecy in voting, to discourage corruption at elections, and to provide for an exclusively official ballot; these laws are modeled more or less on the so-called Australian system in elections. — Civil-service reform, in U. S. politics, reform in the administration of the civil service of the United States; more generally, reform in the administration of the entire public service, federal, State, and local. The main objects of this reform are the abolition of abuses of patronage and the spoils system, discouragement of the interference of office-holders in active politics, abolition of arbitrary appointments to and removals from office, qualification by competitive examination for appointment to all offices of a clerical nature, and promotion for merit. Since the passage of the Civil-service Act in 1871 this reform has been one of the leading questions for public discussion. See Civil-service Act (under civil) and spoils system (under spoil). — Reform Act. See Reform Bill. — Reform Bill, specifically, in Eng. hist., a bill for the purpose of enlarging the number of voters in elections for members of the House of Commons, and of removing inequalities in representation. The first of these bills, passed in 1832 by the Liberals after a violent struggle, and often called specifically The Reform Bill, disfranchised many rotten boroughs, gave increased representation to the large towns, and enlarged the number of the holders of county and borough franchise. The effect of the second Reform Bill, passed by the Conservatives in 1867, was in the direction of a more democratic representation, and the same tendency was further shown in the Franchise Bill (see franchise) passed by the Liberals in 1884. — Reform school, a reformatory. [U. S.] — Spelling reform. See spelling. — Tariff reform. See tariff. = Syn. Amendment, etc. See reformation.

reformable (rē-fôr'ma-bl), a. [< ME. reformable, < OF. reformable, F. réformable = Sp. reformable = Pg. reformavel = It. riformabile, < ML. reformabilis*, < L. reformare, reform: see reform, v.] Capable of being reformed; inclined to reform.

Yf ony of the said articlis be contrary to the liberte of the said cite, or old custumes of the same, thath hit be reformabyll and corrigabill by the Mayre, Bailiffs, and the comen counsayle of the citee.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 337.

A seruaunt not reformable, that Takes to his charge no heede,
Ofte tymes falleth to pouertye;
In wealth he may not byde.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 83.

Woman [Eliz. Young], I have sued for thee indeed, and I promise thee, if thou wilt be reformable, my Lord will be good unto thee. Foxe, Martyrs, III. 769, an. 1558.

reformade† (ref-ọr-mād'), n. [Appar. an Anglicization of reformado.] A reduced or dismissed officer; a disbanded or non-effective soldier.

They also that rode Reformades, and that came down to see the Battle, they shouted . . . and sung. [Marginal note by author, "The Reformades joy."] Bunyan, Holy War, p. 128.

reformado† (ref-ọr-mā'dō), n. and a. [< Sp. reformado = Pg. reformado = It. riformato = F. réformé, reformed, reduced, < L. reformatus, pp. of reformare, reform, refashion, amend: see reform, v.] I. n. 1. A monk who demands or favors the reform of his order.

Amongst others, this was one of Celestin the pope's caveats for his new reformadoes. Weever. (Latham.)

2. A military officer who, for some disgrace, is deprived of his command, but retains his rank and perhaps his pay; also, generally, an officer without a command.

He had . . . writhen himself into the habit of one of your poor infantry, your decayed, ruinous, worm-eaten gentlemen of the round. . . . Into the likeness of one of these reformados had he moulded himself.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iii. 2.

II. a. 1. Penitent; reformed; devoted to reformation.

Venus, and all her naked Loves,
The reformado nymph removes.
Fenton, The Fair Nun.

2. Pertaining to or in the condition of a reformado; hence, inferior, degraded.

Although your church be opposite
To ours, as Black-friars are to White,
In rule and order, yet I grant
You are a reformado saint.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. ii. 116.

reformalize† (rē-fôr'mal-īz), v. i. [Irreg. < reform + -al + -ize; or < re- + formalize.] To make pretension to improvement or to formal correctness.

Christ's doctrine [is] pure, correcting all the unpure glosses of the reformalizing Pharisees.
Loe, Blisse of Brightest Beauty (1614), p. 25. (Latham.) reformation (ref-ọr-mā'shọn), n. [< OF. reformacion, reformation, F. réformation = Pr. reformacio = Sp. reformación = Pg. reformação = It. riformazione, < L. reformatio(n-), a reforming, amending, reformation, transformation, < reformare, pp. reformatus, reform: see reform, v.] 1. The act of forming anew; a second forming in order: as, the reformation of a column of troops into a hollow square. [In this literal sense usually pronounced rē-fôr-mā'shọn, and sometimes written distinctively with a hyphen.]

2. The act of reforming what is defective or evil, or the state of being reformed; correction or amendment, as of life or manners, or of a government.

I would rather thinke (sauing reformacion of other better learned) that this Tharsis . . . were rather some other countrey in the south partes of the world then this Tharsis of Cilicia.
R. Eden, First Books on America (ed. Arber), p. 8.

Never was such a sudden scholar made;
Never came reformation in a flood
With such a heady currance, scouring faults.
Shak., Hen. V., i. 1. 33.

God has set before me two great objects, the suppression of the slave trade and the reformation of manners.
Wilberforce, Journal, Oct. 28, 1787 (Life, v.).

Specifically, with the definite article — 3. [cap.] The great religious revolution in the sixteenth century, which led to the establishment of the Protestant churches. The Reformation assumed different aspects and resulted in alterations of discipline or doctrine more or less fundamental in different countries and in different stages of its progress. Various reformers of great influence, as Wyclif and Huss, had appeared before the sixteenth century, but the Reformation proper began nearly simultaneously in Germany under the lead of Luther and in Switzerland under the lead of Zwingli. The chief points urged by the Reformers were the need of justification by faith, the use and authority of the Scriptures and the right of private judgment in their interpretation, and the abandonment of the doctrine of transubstantiation, the adoration of the Virgin Mary and saints, the supremacy of the Pope, and various other doctrines and rites regarded by the Reformers as unscriptural. In the German Reformation the leading features were the publication at Wittenberg of Luther's ninety-five theses against indulgences in 1517, the excommunication of Luther in 1520, his testimony before the Diet of Worms in 1521, the spread of the principles in many of the German states, as Hesse, Saxony, and Brandenburg, and the opposition to them by the emperor, the Diet and Confession of Augsburg in 1530, and the prolonged struggle between the Protestants and the Catholics, ending with comparative religious equality in the Peace of Passau in 1552. The Reformation spread in Switzerland under Zwingli and Calvin, in France, Hungary, Bohemia, the Scandinavian countries, Low Countries, etc. In Scotland it was introduced by Knox about 1560. In England it led in the reign of Henry VIII. to the abolition of the papal supremacy and the liberation from papal control of the Church of England, which, after a short Roman Catholic reaction under Mary, was firmly established under Elizabeth. In many countries the Reformation occasioned an increased strength and zeal in the Roman Catholic Church sometimes called the Counter-Reformation. The term Reformation as applied to this movement is not of course accepted by Roman Catholics, who use it only with some word of qualification.

Prophesies and Forewarnings . . . sent before of God, by divers and sundry good men, long before the time of Luther, which foretold and prophesied of this Reformation of the Church to come.
Foxe, Martyrs (ed. 1684), II. 43.

Festival of the Reformation, an annual commemoration in Germany, and among Lutherans generally, of the nailing of the ninety-five theses on the doors of the Castle church at Wittenberg on October 31st, 1517.—Reformation of the calendar, the institution of the Gregorian calendar. See calendar.=Syn. 2. Amendment, Reform, Reformation. Amendment may be of any degree, however small; reform applies to something more thorough, and reformation to that which is most important, thorough, and lasting of all. Hence, when we speak of temperance reform, we dignify it less than when we call it temperance reformation. Moral reform, religious reformation; temporary amendment or reform, permanent reformation. Reform represents the state more often than reformation.

reformative (rē-fôr′mā-tiv), a. [= Sp. Pg. reformativo; as reform + -ative.] Forming again; having the property of renewing form.

reformatory (rē-fôr′mā-tō-ri), a. and n. [= F. réformatoire = Sp. Pg. reformatorio; as reform + -atory.] I. a. Having a tendency to reform or renovate; reformative.—Reformatory school, a reformatory. See II.

II. n.; pl. reformatories (-riz). An institution for the reception and reformation of youths who have already begun a career of vice or crime. Reformatories, or reformatory schools, are, in Great Britain, identical in character with certified industrial schools, admission to either being determined by differences of age and criminality, and they differ from ragged schools in so far as they are supported by the state, and receive only such children or youths as are under judicial sentence.

reformed (rē-fôrmd′), p. a. [Early mod. E. also refourmed; < reform + -ed[2].] 1. Corrected; amended; restored to a better or to a good state: as, a reformed profligate; reformed spelling.

Very noble and refourmed knight, by the words of your letter I understood howe quickly ye medicine of my writing came to your heart.
Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 181.

2†. Deprived of rank or position, or reduced in pay. See reformado, 2.—Captain reformed†. See captain.—Reformed Bernardines. See Feuillant, 1.—Reformed Church. (a) A general name for the Protestant bodies on the continent of Europe which trace their origin to the Swiss reformation under Zwingli and Calvin, as distinguished from the Lutheran Church. In France the Reformed were known as Huguenots. In the Netherlands the Arminians afterward separated from the Calvinists (Gomarists). In Germany, after 1817, the greater part of the Reformed and Lutherans combined to form the United Evangelical Church. Specifically—(b) In the United States: (1) The Reformed (Dutch) Church in America, growing out of a union among the Dutch churches in America in 1770 and finally perfected in 1812. The territory of the denomination was at first limited to the States of New York and New Jersey and a small part of Pennsylvania, but was gradually extended to the West. The affairs of each congregation are managed by a consistory, consisting of elders and deacons chosen for two years. The elders, with the pastor, receive and dismiss members and exercise discipline; the deacons have charge of the alms. Both together are ex officio trustees of the church, hold its property, and call its minister. Ex-elders and ex-deacons constitute what is called the Great Consistory, which may be summoned to give advice in important matters. The minister and one elder from each congregation in a certain district constitute a classis, which supervises spiritual concerns in that district. Four ministers and four elders from each classis in a larger district make a Particular Synod, with similar powers. Representatives, clerical and lay, from each classis, proportioned in number to the size of the classis, constitute the General Synod, which has supervision of the whole, and is a court of last resort in judicial cases. The church is Calvinistic in its theological belief, and possesses a liturgy the greater part of which is optional except the offices for the sacraments, for ordination, and for church discipline. (2) The Reformed (German) Church in the United States. This church was constituted by colonies from Germany in New York, Maryland, Virginia, and North and South Carolina. The first synod was organized September 27th, 1747, under the care of the Reformed Classis of Amsterdam. The church holds to the parity of the ministry, maintains a presbyterial form of government, is moderately Calvinistic in its theology, and provides liturgical forms of service, which are, however, chiefly optional. (3) The True Reformed Dutch Church, the result of a secession from the Reformed Dutch Church in America in 1822. (4) The Reformed Episcopal Church, an Episcopal church organized in the United States in 1873, by eight clergymen and twenty laymen previously members of the Protestant Episcopal Church. It maintains the episcopacy as a desirable form of church polity, but not as of divine obligation, continues to use the Book of Common Prayer, but in a revised form, and rejects the doctrines of apostolic succession, the priesthood of the clergy, the sacrifice or oblation in the Lord's Supper, the real presence, and baptismal regeneration.—Reformed officer, in the British army, one who is continued on full pay or half-pay after his troops are broken up. Farrow, Mil. Encyc.—Reformed Presbyterian Church, a Presbyterian denomination originating in Scotland. See Cameronian, n., 1, and Covenanter, 2.—Reformed procedure. See equity, 2 (b).—The Reformed, on the continent of Europe, Calvinistic Protestants as distinguished from Lutherans.

reformedly† (rē-fôr′med-li), adv. In or after the manner of a reform. [Rare.]

A fierce Reformer once, now ranckl'd with a contrary heat, would send us back, very reformedly indeed, to learn Reformation from Tyndarus and Rebuffus, two canonical Promoters. Milton, Touching Hirelings.

reformer (rē-fôr′mėr), n. [< reform + -er[1].] 1. One who effects a reformation or amendment: as, a reformer of manners or of abuses; specifically [cap.], one of those who instituted or assisted in the religious reformatory movements of the sixteenth century and earlier.

God's passionless reformers, influences
That purify and heal and are not seen.
Lowell, Under the Willows.

2. One who promotes or urges reform: as, a tariff reformer; a spelling reformer.

They could not call him a revenue reformer, and still less could they call him a civil-service reformer, for there were few abuses of the civil service of which he had not, during the whole of his life, been an active promoter.
The Nation, XV. 68.

reformist (rē-fôr′mist), n. [= F. réformiste; as reform + -ist.] 1†. [cap.] One who is of the reformed religion; a Protestant.

This comely Subordination of Degrees we once had, and we had a visible conspicuous Church, to whom all other Reformists gave the upper Hand. Howell, Letters, iv. 36.

2. One who proposes or favors a political reform. [Rare.]

Such is the language of reform, and the spirit of a reformist! I. D'Israeli, Calam. of Authors, p. 204.

refortify (rē-fôr′ti-fī), v. t. [= OF. (and F.) refortifier = It. rifortificare, < ML. refortificare, < L. re-, again, + ML. fortificare, fortify: see fortify.] To fortify anew.

refossion† (rē-fosh′ọn), n. [< L. refossus, pp. of refodere, dig up or out again, < re-, again, + fodere, dig: see fossil.] The act of digging up again.

Hence are . . . refossion of graues, torturing of the surviving, worse than many deaths.
Bp. Hall, St. Paul's Combat.

refound[1] (rē-found′), v. t. [< OF. (and F.) refonder, found or build again, < re-, again, + fonder, found: see found[2].] To found again or anew; establish on a different basis.

George II. refounded and reformed the Chair which I have the honour to fill.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 4.

refound[2] (rē-found′), v. t. [< OF. (and F.) refondre = Pr. refondre = Sp. Pg. refundir = It. rifondere, cast over again, recast, < L. refundere, pour back or out, < re-, back, + fundere, pour: see found[3].] To found or cast anew.

Perhaps they are all antient bells refounded.
T. Warton, Hist. Kiddington, p. 8.

refounder (rē-foun′dėr), n. [< refound[1] + -er[1].] One who refounds, rebuilds, or reëstablishes.

Charlemagne, . . . the refounder of that empire which is the ideal of despotism in the Western world.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 142.

refract (rē-frakt′), v. t. [= F. réfracter, < L. refractus, pp. of refringere, break back, break up, break open, hence turn aside, < re-, back, + frangere, break: see fraction. Cf. refrain[2].] To bend sharply or abruptly; especially, in optics, to bend from the straight path, as a ray of light, on passing obliquely from one medium into another of a different optical density. See refraction.

Visual beams refracted through another's eye.
Selden, Pref. to Drayton's Polyolbion.

refractable (rē-frak′ta-bl), a. [< refract + -able.] Capable of being refracted; refrangible, as a ray of light or heat. Dr. H. More.

refractary† (rē-frak′ta-ri), a. [= OF. refractaire, F. réfractaire = Sp. Pg. refractario = It. refrattario, < L. refractarius, stubborn, obstinate, refractory, < refringere, pp. refractus, break in pieces: see refract and -ary[1]. Cf. refractory.] The earlier and more correct form of refractory. Cotgrave.

refracted (rē-frak′ted), a. In bot., abruptly bent backward from the base.

refracting (rē-frak′ting), p. a. Serving or tending to refract; turning from a direct course.—Doubly refracting spar, Iceland spar. See calcite and spar[2].—Refracting angle of a prism, the angle formed by the two faces of the triangular prism used to decompose white or solar light.—Refracting dial. See dial.—Refracting surface, a surface bounding two transparent media, at which a ray of light, in passing from one into the other, undergoes refraction.—Refracting system, in lighthouses, same as dioptric system (which see, under dioptric).—Refracting telescope. See telescope.

refraction (rē-frak′shọn), n. [< OF. refraction, F. réfraction = Sp. refracción = Pg. refracção = It. rifrazione, refrazione, < ML. refractio(n-), lit. a breaking up (in logic tr. Gr. ἀνάκλασις), NL. refraction, < L. refringere, pp. refractus, break up, break open, break to pieces: see refract.] 1. The act of refracting, or the state of being refracted: almost exclusively restricted to physics, and applied to a change of direction of rays, as of light, heat, or sound, which are obliquely incident upon and pass through a surface bounding two media differing in optical density, as air and water, or of rays which traverse a medium the density of which is not uniform, as the atmosphere. It is found (1) that, when passing into a denser isotropic medium, the ray is refracted toward the perpendicular to the surface, and bent away from it when passing into one less dense; (2) that the sines or the angles of incidence and refraction bear a constant ratio to each other for any two given media; and (3) that the incident ray and the refracted ray are in the same plane. Thus, if (fig. 1) SP represents a ray incident upon the surface of water at P, it will be bent away from its original direction SPL toward the perpendicular Qq in passing into the denser medium, and make an angle *q*PR, such that the $\frac{\sin SPQ}{\sin RPq}$ is a constant quantity—that is, the perpendicular distance of the point q (such that the line from it to P, the point of incidence, is normal to the surface) from the refracted path bears a constant ratio to its distance from the path as it would be without refraction, however the angle of incidence varies; but this constant depends on the nature of the two media. If the first medium is air, this constant ratio is called the index of refraction or refractive index of the given substance (or n). Again, if the ray proceeded from R to P, it would be bent away from the perpendicular in the direction PS. The latter case is peculiar, however, in that for a certain angle of incidence called the critical angle (whose sine = 1/n) the angle of refraction of QPS is a right angle and a ray incident at P at any greater angle cannot pass out into the rarer medium at all, but suffers total reflection at P. In fig. 2, AHC is the angle of incidence, and EHK the angle of refraction, CD being the normal to the surface; if, further, the second surface is parallel to the first, the ray emerging into the original medium at E has a direction EF parallel with its first direction, AH. If (fig. 3) the refracting medium has the form of a prism (ABC), the incident ray LF suffers a double change of direction, first (FE) in passing into the prism, and second (EG) in emerging from it; the total angle of deviation IDL varies in value with a change in the direction of LF, but has a definite minimum value when the angles of incidence and emergence are equal. If d represents the angle of the prism BAC, and r the angle of minimum deviation, LDI, then the refractive index n of the material of which the prism is made is given by the relation $n = \frac{\sin \frac{1}{2}(d + r)}{\sin \frac{1}{2} d}$. The angle of deviation or refraction also increases as the wave-length of the ray diminishes, and hence a beam of white light in passing through a prism is both refracted and dispersed, thus yielding a spectrum. The phenomena of the refraction of light explain the properties of lenses (see lens) and of prisms (see prism and spectrum). Sound-waves may also be refracted when passing from one medium to another of different density, obeying the same laws as light. Double refraction is the separation of a ray of light into two rays, which are unequally refracted upon passing through an anisotropic medium. This property belongs to all transparent crystalline substances except those of the isometric system. A striking example is calcite, hence called doubly refracting spar. In uniaxial crystals (those belonging to the tetragonal and hexagonal systems) one of the rays follows the ordinary law of refraction (see law (2), above), and is called the ordinary ray; the other, which does not, is called the extraordinary ray; both rays are polarized (see polarization), the ordinary ray having vibrations perpendicular to and the extraordinary ray vibrations parallel to the vertical axis. If the index of refraction is greater for the ordinary ray than for the extraordinary ray, the crystal is said to be negative, and in the opposite case positive: otherwise expressed, a crystal is negative or positive according as the crystallographic axis (optical axis) is the axis of greatest or of least elasticity. In the direction of the vertical axis a ray suffers no double refraction, and this direction is called the optic axis. In biaxial crystals (those belonging to the orthorhombic, monoclinic, and triclinic systems) neither ray follows the ordinary law of refraction, and there are two directions, called optic axes, lying in the plane of the axes of greatest and least elasticity, in which a ray suffers no double refraction. There are also three indices of refraction, corresponding to the rays propagated by vibrations parallel to the three axes of elasticity. A biaxial crystal is called negative or positive according as the acute bisectrix coincides with the axis of greatest or of least elasticity. According to the degree of difference between the two indices of refraction of a uniaxial crystal and between the greatest and least of the three indices of a biaxial crystal, the double refraction is said to be strong or weak; upon this difference depends the brilliancy of color of thin sections of a crystal as seen in polarized light. Amorphous substances like glass do not show double refraction, except under abnormal conditions, as when subjected to unequal strains, as in glass suddenly cooled. This is also true of crystals belonging to the isometric system, which, however, sometimes show secondary or abnormal double refraction (as garnet), due to internal molecular strain or other cause. For the refraction of the eye, see eye[1], and crystalline humor (under crystalline). Errors of refraction in the eye are tested by trial with lenses, test types, etc., by the ophthalmoscope, or by skiascopy or the shadow-test, and are corrected by appropriate glasses.

2. In logic, the relation of the Theophrastian moods to the direct moods of the first figure.—Astronomical or atmospheric refraction, the apparent angular elevation of the heavenly bodies above their true places, caused by the refraction of the rays of light in their passage through the earth's atmosphere, so that in consequence of this refraction those bodies appear higher than they really are. It is greatest when the body is on the horizon, and diminishes all the way to the zenith, where it is zero.—Axis of double refraction. See optic axis (b), under optic.—Axis of refraction. See axis[1].—Caustic by refraction. See diacaustic.—Conical refraction, the refraction of a single ray of light, under certain conditions, into an infinite number of rays in the form of a hollow luminous cone, consisting of two kinds, external conical refraction and internal conical refraction, the ray in the former case issuing from the refracting crystal as a cone with its vertex at the point of emergence, and in the latter being converted into a cone on entering the crystal, and issuing as a hollow cylinder.—Double refraction. See def. 1.—Dynamic refraction, refraction of the eye as increased in accommodation.—Electrical double refraction, the double refraction produced in an isotropic dielectric medium, as glass, under the action of an electrical strain.—Index of refraction. See index, and def. 1.—Plane of refraction, the plane passing through the normal or perpendicular to the refracting surface at the point of incidence and the refracted ray.—Point of refraction. See point[1].—Refraction equivalent, a phrase used by Landolt to express in the case of a liquid the quantity obtained by multiplying the molecular weight of the liquid by the so-called specific refractive energy, as defined by Gladstone and Dale (namely, the refractive index less unity divided by its density referred to water). The refraction equivalent of a compound is said to be equal to the sum of the equivalents of its component parts.—Refraction of altitude and declination, of ascension and descension, of latitude and longitude, the change in the altitude, declination, etc., of a heavenly body due to the effect of atmospheric refraction.—Refraction of sound, the bending of a system of sound-waves from its course whenever it undergoes an unequal acceleration or retardation, necessarily turning toward the side of least velocity and from the side of greatest velocity.—Static refraction, refraction of the eye when the accommodation is entirely relaxed.—Terrestrial refraction, that refraction which makes terrestrial objects appear to be raised higher than they are in reality. This arises from the air being denser near the surface of the earth than it is at higher elevations, its refractive power increasing as the density increases. The mirage is a phenomenon of ★terrestrial refraction.

refractive (rē-frak′tiv), a. [< F. réfractif = Pg. refractivo; as refract + -ive.] Of or pertaining to refraction; serving or having power to refract or turn from a direct course.—Refractive index. Same as index of refraction. See index and refraction.—Refractive power, in optics, the power, as expressed by the index of refraction, which a substance has of bending from its path light which passes obliquely through it.

refractiveness (rē-frak′tiv-nes), n. The state ★or quality of being refractive.

refractivity (rē-frak-tiv′i-ti), n. [< refractive + -ity.] See the quotation.

> The refractivity of a substance is the difference between the index of refraction of the substance and unity.
> Philosophical Mag., 5th ser., XXVIII. 400.

★refractometer (rē-frak-tom′e-tėr), n. [Irreg. < L. refractus, pp. of refringere, break up (see refract), + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An instrument used for measuring the refractive indices of different substances. Many forms of this have been devised; and the term is specifically applied to an instrument which employs interference fringes and which allows of the measurement of the difference of path of two interfering rays—the immediate object of observation being the displacement produced by the passage of the ray through a known thickness of the given medium, from which its refractive power can be found. Such refractometers (interferential refractometers) may also be employed for other purposes, for example, in certain cases of linear measurement.

refractor (rē-frak′tọr), n. [= F. réfracteur; as refract + -or[1].] A refracting telescope. See telescope.

refractorily (rē-frak′tọ-ri-li), adv. In a refractory manner; perversely; obstinately. Imp. Dict.

refractoriness (rē-frak′tọ-ri-nes), n. The state or character of being refractory, in any sense.

refractory (rē-frak′tọ-ri), a. and n. [Erroneously for the earlier refractary, < L. refractarius, stubborn, obstinate, refractory: see refractary.]

I. a. 1. Resisting; unyielding; sullen or perverse in opposition or disobedience; obstinate in non-compliance; stubborn and unmanageable.

> There is a law in each well-order'd nation
> To curb those raging appetites that are > Most disobedient and refractory.
> Shak., T. and C., ii. 2. 182.

> Our care and caution should be more carefully employed in mortification of our natures and acquist of such virtues to which we are more refractory.
> Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 8.

> He then dissolved Parliament, and sent its most refractory members to the Tower.
> D. Webster, Speech, Senate, May 7, 1834.

2. Resisting ordinary treatment or strains, etc.; difficult of fusion, reduction, or the like: said especially of metals and the like that require an extraordinary degree of heat to fuse them, or that do not yield readily to the hammer. In metallurgy an ore is said to be refractory when it is with difficulty treated by metallurgical processes, or when it is not easily reduced. Stone, brick, etc., are refractory when they resist the action of fire without melting, cracking, or crumbling. Refractory materials are such as can be used for the lining of furnaces and crucibles, and for similar purposes.

3. Not susceptible; not subject; resisting (some influence, as of disease). [Rare.]

> Pasteur claimed to so completely tame the virus that a dog would, in being rendered refractory to rabies by hypodermic inoculation or trepanning, show no sign of illness.
> Science, III. 744.

Refractory period of a muscle, the time after a first stimulus when the muscle is not irritable by a second stimulus. This has been found for striated frog's muscle, after a maximal first stimulation, to be about $\frac{1}{500}$ second.—Syn. 1. Stubborn, Intractable, etc. (see obstinate), unruly, ungovernable, unmanageable, headstrong, mulish.

II. n.; pl. refractories (-riz). 1†. One who is obstinate in opposition or disobedience.

> Render not yourself a refractory on the sudden.
> B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

2†. Obstinate opposition.

> Glorying in their scandalous refractories to public order and constitutions.
> Jer. Taylor (?), Artif. Handsomeness, p. 138.

3. In pottery, a piece of ware covered with a vaporable flux and placed in a kiln to communicate a glaze to other articles. E. H. Knight.

refracture (rē-frak′tūr), n. [< re- + fracture. In def. 2 with ref. to refractory.] 1. A breaking again, as of a badly set bone.—2†. Refractoriness; antagonism. [Rare.]

> More veniall and excusable may those verball reluctancies, reserves, and refractures (rather than anything of open force and hostile rebellions) seem.
> Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 562. (Davies.) refragability (ref″ra-ga-bil′i-ti), n. [< ML. refragabilita(t-)s, < refragabilis, refragable: see refragable.] The state or quality of being refragable; refragableness. Bailey.

refragable (ref′ra-ga-bl), a. [= Pg. refragavel, < ML. refragabilis, resistible, < L. refragari, oppose, resist, gainsay, contest: see refragate.] Capable of being opposed or resisted; refutable. Bailey.

refragableness (ref′ra-ga-bl-nes), n. The character of being refragable. [Rare.]

refragate† (ref′ra-gāt), v. i. [< L. refragatus, pp. of refragari, oppose, resist, contest, gainsay, < re-, back, again, + fragari, perhaps < frangere (√ frag), break: see fragile.] To oppose; be opposite in effect; break down under examination, as theories or proofs.

> And 'tis the observation of the noble St. Alban that that philosophy is built on a few vulgar experiments; and if, upon further inquiry, any were found to refragate, they were to be discharg'd by a distinction.
> Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, xix.

refrain[1] (rē-frān′), v. [Early mod. E. refrayne, refreyne, < ME. refreinen, refreynen, refraynen, < OF. refraindre, refreindre, also refrener, F. refréner, bridle, restrain, repress, = Pr. Sp. refrenar = Pg. refrear = It. raffrenare, < LL. refrenare, bridle, hold in with a bit, < L. re-, back, + frenum, frænum, a bit, curb, pl. frena, curb and reins, a bridle: see frenum.] I. trans. 1. To hold back; restrain; curb; keep from action.

> My son, . . . refrain thy foot from their path.
> Prov. i. 15.

> In this plight, therefore, he went home, and refrained himself as long as he could, that his wife and children should not perceive his distress.
> Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 84.

> The fierceness of them shalt thou refrain.
> Ps. lxxvi. 10 (Psalter).

2†. To forbear; abstain from; quit.

> Men may also refreyne venial sinne by receyvynge worthily of the precious body of Jhesu Crist.
> Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

> At length, when the sun waxed low,
> Then all the whole train the grove did refrain,
> And unto their caves they did go.
> Robin Hood and Little John (Child's Ballads, V. 222).

> I cannot refrain lamenting, however, in the most poignant terms, the fatal policy too prevalent in most of the states.
> Washington, quoted in Bancroft's Hist. Const., I. 282.

II. intrans. To forbear; abstain; keep one's self from action or interference.

> Dreadfull of daunger that mote him betyde,
> She oft and oft adviz'd him to refraine
> From chase of greater beastes.
> Spenser, F. Q., III. i. 37.

> Refrain from these men, and let them alone.
> Acts v. 38.

> The chat, the nuthatch, and the jay are still;
> The robin too refrains.
> Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 718.

refrain[2] (rē-frān′), n. [< ME. refraine, refreyne, < OF. (and F.) refrain, a refrain (= Pr. refranh, refrim, a refrain, = Sp. refrán = Pg. refrão, a proverb, an oft-repeated saying), < refraindre, repeat, sing a song, = Pr. refranher, refrenher, repeat, = It. refragnere, refract, reverberate, < L. refringere, break back, break off: see refract.] 1. A burden or chorus recurring at regular intervals in the course of a song or ballad, usually at the end of each stanza.

> Everemo "allas?" was his refreyne.
> Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1571.

> They sang the refrain:—
> "The roads should blossom, the roads should bloom,
> So fair a bride shall leave her home!"
> Longfellow, Blind Girl of Castèl-Cuillè.

2. The musical phrase or figure to which the burden of a song is set. It has the same relation to the main part of the tune that the burden has to the main text of the song.

3. An after-taste or -odor; that impression which lingers on the sense: as, the refrain of a Cologne water, of a perfume, of a wine.

refrainer (rē-frā′nėr), n. [Early mod. E. refreinor; < refrain[1] + -er[1].] One who refrains.

> So these ii. persons were euer cohibetors and refreinors of the kinges wilfull skope and vnbrideled libertie.
> Hall, Hen. VII., an. 18.

refraining† (rē-frā′ning), n. [< ME. refraining, the singing of the burden of a song; verbal n. of refrain*[2], v., < OF. refrener, sing a refrain, refraindre, repeat, sing a song: see refrain[2].] The singing of the burden of a song.

> She . . . couthe make in song sich refreynynge,
> It sat [became] hir wonder wel to synge.
> Rom. of the Rose, l. 749.

refrainment (rē-frān′ment), n. [= F. refrènement = Sp. refrenamiento = Pg. refreamento = It. raffrenamento; as refrain[1] + -ment.] The act of refraining; abstinence; forbearance.

> Forbearance and Indurance . . . we may otherwise call Refrainment and Support.
> Shaftesbury, Judgment of Hercules, vi. § 4.

refrait†, n. [Also refret; < ME. refraite, refraide, refrayde, refret, < OF. refrait, a refrain, < refraindre, repeat: see refrain[2].] Same as refrain[2].

> The refraite of his laye salewed the Kynge Arthur and the Quene Gonnore, and alle the other after.
> Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 615.

reframe (rē-frām′), v. t. [< re- + frame.] To frame or put together again.

refranation (ref-ra-nā′shọn), n. [Irreg. < L. refrænatio(n-), refrenation: see refrenation.] In astrol., the failure of a planetary aspect to occur, owing to a retrograde motion of one of the planets.

refrangibility (rē-fran-ji-bil′i-ti), n. [= F. réfrangibilité = Sp. refrangibilidad = Pg. refrangibilidade = It. rifrangibilità; as refrangible + -ity (see -bility).] The property of being refrangible; susceptibility of refraction; the degree in which rays of light, etc., are capable of being refracted or turned out of a direct course in passing out of one medium into another.

refrangible (rē-fran′ji-bl), a. [= F. réfrangible = Sp. refrangible = Pg. refrangivel = It. rifrangibile, refrangible, < L. refringere, refract (see refract), + -ible.] Capable of being refracted in passing from one medium to another, as rays of light. The violet rays in the spectrum are ordinarily more refracted than those of greater wave-length, as the red rays.

> Some of them [rays of light] are more refrangible than others.
> Locke, Elem. of Nat. Philos., xi.

refrangibleness (rē-fran′ji-bl-nes), n. The character or property of being refrangible; refrangibility. Bailey.

refreeze (rē-frēz′), v. t. [< re- + freeze.] To freeze a second time.

> Partially refrozen under continual agitation.
> Proc. Physical Soc., London, ii. 62. (Encyc. Dict.)

refreid†, refroid†, v. [ME. refreiden, refreyden, refroiden, < OF. refreider, refreidier, refroidir, reffroidir, F. refroidir, render cold or cool, chill, etc., = Pr. refreidar, refreydir = Sp. Pg. resfriar = It. raffreddare, < ML. refrigidare, make cold or cool, < L. re-, again, + frigidus, cold: see frigid. Cf. refrigerate.] I. trans. To make cool; chill.

> He . . . shal som tyme be moeved in hymself, but if he were al refreyded by siknesse, or by malefice of sorcerie, or colde drynkes.
> Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

> Nevew, be not so roth, refroide youre maltalente, ffor wrath hath many a worthi man and wise made to be holde for foles while the rage endureth.
> Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 500.

II. intrans. To grow cool.

> God wot, refreyden may this hoote fare,
> Er Calkas sende Troylus Cryseyde.
> Chaucer, Troilus, v. 507.

refrenation† (ref-rē-nā′shon), n. [< OF. refrenation, F. refrénation = Sp. refrenación, < L. refrenatio(n-), a bridling, curbing, restraining, < refrenare, bridle, curb, check: see refrain[1].] The act of restraining. Cotgrave.

refresh (rē-fresh′), v. [< ME. refreshen, refreschen, refrisschen, < OF. refreschir, refraischir, also refreschier, refraissier (= Sp. Pg. refrescar = It. rinfrescare, < ML. refrescare, refriscare), refresh, cool, < L. re-, again, + friscus, frescus, new, recent, fresh: see fresh.] I. trans. 1. To make fresh or as if new again; freshen; improve; restore; repair; renovate.

I have desirid hym to move the Counsell for refreshing of the toun of Yermowth with stuff of ordnance and gonnes and gonne powdre, and he seid he wolde. Paston Letters, I. 427.

Before I entered on my voyage, I took care to refresh my memory among the classic authors. Addison, Remarks on Italy, Pref.

I remember, old gentleman, how often you went home in a day to refresh your countenance and dress when Teraminta reigned in your heart. Steele, Tatler, No. 95.

As in some solitude the summer rill
Refreshes, where it winds, the faded green.
Cowper, In Memory of John Thornton.

2. To make fresh or vigorous again; restore vigor or energy to; give new strength to; reinvigorate; recreate or revive after fatigue, privation, pain, or the like; reanimate.

I am glad of the coming of Stephanas and Fortunatus, . . . for they have refreshed my spirit and yours. 1 Cor. xvi. 17, 18.

And labour shall refresh itself with hope,
To do your grace incessant services.
Shak., Hen. V., ii. 2. 37.

There are two causes by the influence of which memory may be refreshed, and by that means rendered, at the time of deposition, more vivid than, by reason of the joint influence of the importance of the fact and the ancientness of it, it would otherwise be. One is intermediate statements. . . . Another is fresh incidents. Bentham, Judicial Evidence, i. 10.

3. To steep and soak, particularly vegetables, in pure water with a view to restore their fresh appearance.=Syn. 1 and 2. To revive, renew, recruit, recreate, enliven, cheer.

II. intrans. 1. To become fresh or vigorous again; revive; become reanimated or reinvigorated.

I went to visite Dr. Tenison at Kensington, whither he was retired to refresh after he had ben sick of the smallpox. Evelyn, Diary, March 7, 1684.

2. To take refreshment, as food or drink. [Colloq.]

Tumblers refreshing during the cessation of their performances. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, lxvi.

3. To lay in a fresh stock of provisions. [Colloq.]

We met an American whaler going in to refresh.
Simmond's Colonial Mag. (Imp. Dict.)

refresh† (rē-fresh′), n. [< refresh, v.] The act of refreshing; refreshment.

Beauty, sweete love, is like the morning dew,
Whose short refresh upon the tender green Cheers for a time. Daniel, Sonnets, xlvii.

refreshen (rē-fresh′n), v. t. [< re- + freshen.] To make fresh again; refresh; renovate. [Rare.]

In order to keep the mind in repair, it is necessary to replace and refreshen those impressions of nature which are continually wearing away.
Sir J. Reynolds, On Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting, Note 28.

It had begun to rain, the clouds emptying themselves in bulk . . . to animate and refreshen the people.
S. Judd, Margaret, i. 13.

refresher (rē-fresh′ėr), n. 1. One who or that which refreshes, revives, or invigorates; that which refreshes the memory.

This [swimming] is the purest exercise of health,
The kind refresher of the summer heats.
Thomson, Summer, l. 1258.

Every fortnight or so I took care that he should receive a refresher, as lawyers call it—a new and revised brief memorialising my pretensions.
De Quincey, Sketches, I. 72. (Davies.)

Miss Peecher [a schoolmistress] went into her little official residence, and took a refresher of the principal rivers and mountains of the world.
Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, ii. 1.

2. A fee paid to counsel for continuing attention or readiness, for the purpose of refreshing his memory as to the facts of a case before him, in the intervals of business, especially when the case is adjourned. [Colloq., Eng.]

Had he gone to the bar, he might have attained to the dignity of the Bench, after feathering his nest comfortably with retainers and refreshers.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XL. 28.

refreshful (rē-fresh′fûl), a. [< refresh + -ful.] Full of refreshment; refreshing.

They spread the breathing harvest to the sun,
That throws refreshful round a rural smell.
Thomson, Summer, l. 364.

refreshfully (rē-fresh′fûl-i), adv. In a refreshing manner; so as to refresh.

Refreshfully
There came upon my face . . .
Dew-drops. Keats, Endymion, i.

refreshing (rē-fresh′ing), n. [Verbal n. of refresh, v.] Refreshment; that which refreshes; relief after fatigue or suffering.

And late vs rest as for a daye or twayne,
That your pepill may haue refresshing;
Thanne we wolle geve them batell new ageyn.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 2991.

Secret refreshings that repair his strength.
Milton, S. A., l. 665.

refreshing (rē-fresh′ing), p. a. [Ppr. of refresh, v.] Tending or serving to refresh; invigorating; reviving; reanimating: sometimes used with a humorous or sarcastic implication.

Who [Ceres] with thy saffron wings upon my flowers
Diffusest honey-drops, refreshing showers.
Shak., Tempest, iv. 1. 79.

And one good action in the midst of crimes
Is "quite refreshing," in the affected phrase
Of these ambrosial Pharisaic times.
Byron, Don Juan, viii. 90.

refreshingly (rē-fresh′ing-li), adv. In a refreshing manner; so as to refresh or give new life.

refreshingness (rē-fresh′ing-nes), n. The character of being refreshing. Imp. Dict.

refreshment (rē-fresh′ment), n. [< OF. refreschement, refraischement, etc. (also rafrechissement, rafraischissement, rafraichissement, F. rafraîchissement), refreshment; as refresh + -ment.] 1. The act of refreshing, or the state of being refreshed; relief after exhaustion, etc.

Although the worship of God is the chief end of the institution [the Sabbath], yet the refreshment of the lower ranks of mankind by an intermission of their labours is indispensably a secondary object.
Bp. Horsley, Works, II. xxiii.

2. That which refreshes; a recreation; that which gives fresh strength or vigor, as food, drink, or rest: in the plural it is now almost exclusively applied to food and drink.

When we need
Refreshment, whether food or talk between,
Food of the mind. Milton, P. L., ix. 237.

Having taken a little refreshment, we went to the Latin Convent, at which all Frank Pilgrims are wont to be entertained. Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 67.

Such honest refreshments and comforts of life our Christian liberty has made it lawful for us to use. Bp. Sprat.

"May I offer you any refreshment, Mr. ——? I haven't the advantage of your name." Thackeray, Pendennis, xv.

Refreshment Sunday, the fourth Sunday in Lent; Midlent Sunday. The name of Refreshment or Refection Sunday (Dominica Refectionis) is generally explained as referring to the feeding of the multitude mentioned in the Gospel for the day (John vi. 1–14). Also called Bragget Sunday, Jerusalem Sunday, Lætare, Mothering Sunday, Rose Sunday, Simnel Sunday.

refret†, refrete†, n. See refrait.

refrication† (ref-ri-kā′shon), n. [< L. refricare, rub or scratch open again, < re-, again, + fricare, rub: see friction.] A rubbing up afresh.

In these legal sacrifices there is a continual refrication of the memory of those sins every year which we have committed. Bp. Hall, Hard Texts, Heb. x. 3.

★refrigerant (rē-frij′ė-rant), a. and n. [< OF. refrigerant, F. réfrigérant = Sp. Pg. refrigerante = It. refrigerante, rifrigerante, < L. refrigeran(t-)s, ppr. of refrigerare, make cool, grow cool again: see refrigerate.] I. a. Abating heat; cooling.

Unctuous liniments or salves . . . devised as lenitive and refrigerant. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxxiv. 18.

II. n. 1. Anything which abates the sensation of heat, or cools.—2. Figuratively, anything which allays or extinguishes.

This almost never fails to prove a refrigerant to passion. Blair.

★refrigerate (rē-frij′ė-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. refrigerated, ppr. refrigerating. [< L. refrigeratus, pp. of refrigerare (> It. refrigerare, rifrigerare = Sp. Pg. refrigerar = F. réfrigérer), make cool again, < re-, again, + frigerare, make cool: see frigerate.] To cool; make cold; allay the heat of.

The great brizes which the motion of the air in great circles (such as are under the girdle of the world) produceth, which do refrigerate. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 398.

The air is intolerably cold, either continually refrigerated with frosts or disturbed with tempests.
Goldsmith, Animated Nature, I. 142.

refrigerate† (rē-frij′ė-rāt), a. [< ME. refrigerate, < L. refrigeratus, pp.: see the verb.] Cooled; made or kept cool; allayed.

Nowe benes, . . .
. . . upplucked soone,
Made clene, and sette up wel refrigerate,
From grobbes saue wol kepe up theire estate.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 160.

refrigerating-chamber (rē-frij′ė-rā-ting-chām″bėr), n. A chamber in which the air is artificially cooled, used especially for the storage of perishable provisions during warm weather.

refrigerating-machine (rē-frij′ė-rā-ting-ma-shēn″), n. A machine for the production of cold. In such machines mechanical power is used to convert heat into work by operating upon a gas at a temperature (and pressure) somewhat removed from that at which such gas becomes a liquid. They perform the following cycle of operations: first, the gas is compressed into a smaller volume, in which compression its contained heat is increased by the heat-equivalent of the work performed in the compression; secondly, the compressed gas is cooled under constant pressure, and thus brought near to the temperature of the cooling medium (usually water), and the increase of heat due to compression is removed; thirdly, the compressed and cooled gas is permitted to expand, expending a portion of its expansive force in the performance of work. This work having been performed at the expense of the store of heat originally contained in the gas, the latter has now lost the heat-equivalent of the work, and its temperature is greatly lowered. The now cold gas can be used for the refrigeration of any other substance which has a higher temperature by methods described under ice-machine and refrigeration. In other machines a gas or vapor the ordinary temperature of which is near to that at which it liquefies is compressed and cooled, and subsequently permitted to assume the gaseous form. By the compression the temperature of liquefaction is raised till it becomes the same as or a little higher than that of a conveniently available cooling medium, such as ordinary atmospheric air, or, most commonly, water at ordinary temperature, the application of which to cooling the gas still under constant pressure reduces it to the liquid state, or to a state of intermixed liquid and gas. The subsequent expansion of the liquid into gas is performed at the expense of its inner heat. It therefore suffers a reduction of temperature, to restore which it absorbs its latent heat of vaporization from a surrounding or contiguous substance (usually a saline solution), which, thus made cold, is used for cooling air-spaces, or refrigerators or substances therein contained, or for making ice. Machines of either of the above classes are very commonly called ice-machines, and are so styled in the classifications of inventions in both the United States and British patent-offices, whether designed for the manufacture of ice, for merely cooling substances in insulated spaces or refrigerators, or for both these purposes.

refrigeration (rē-frij-ė-rā′shon), n. [< OF. refrigeration, F. réfrigération = Sp. refrigeración = Pg. refrigeração = It. refrigerazione, < L. refrigeratio(n-), a cooling, coolness, mitigation (of diseases), < refrigerare, pp. refrigeratus, make cool again: see refrigerate.] 1. The act of refrigerating or cooling; the abatement of heat; the state of being cooled.

Suche thynges as are fyned by continuall heate, mouynge, and circulation are hyndered by refrigeration or coulde.
R. Eden, tr. of Jacobus Gastaldus (First Books on [America, ed. Arber, p. 294).

The testimony of geological evidence . . . indicates a general refrigeration of climate.
Croll, Climate and Time, p. 530.

Specifically—2. The operation of cooling various substances by artificial processes. This is effected by the use of inclosures in which the articles to be cooled are placed on or in proximity to ice or other refrigerating substances or freezing-mixtures, or in air cooled by a refrigerating-machine or -apparatus; or, as in beer-cooling, by floating metallic pans or vessels containing ice upon the surface of the liquid to be cooled, or by circulating the latter over an extended surface of some good conductor of heat cooled by continuous contact of cold water, cold air, or cold brine with the opposite surface. See ice-machine and refrigerating-machine.—Chemical refrigeration, refrigeration by the use of mixtures of substances which, by their admixture, are mutually liquefied or one or more of which are dissolved in the others, processes in which heat is absorbed so that there is a pronounced lowering of the temperature of the surroundings. Remarkable changes of temperature are thus produced by a variety of refrigerating mixtures or freezing-mixtures. See freezing-mixture.—Mechanical refrigeration. (a) In its strictest sense, the conversion of heat into work by the expansion of a volume of gas or vapor which performs work during the act of expansion, as in moving a piston against some resistance, usually that of a pump or compressor for compressing another volume of such gas or vapor. The gas during the expansion, if it expands adiabatically, is reduced in temperature by the conversion of its inner heat into work, the reduction being found in degrees by dividing the work due to the expansion by the product of the specific heat of the gas, the weight of the volume expanded, and the mechanical equivalent of heat. Air mechanically refrigerated is frequently discharged directly into refrigerators or rooms it is desired to cool, but in apparatus for cooling by the use of other gases and vapors a strong solution of some salt which resists freezing at low temperatures—as sodium, calcium, or magnesium chlorid—is used as a medium for extracting heat from the substances and spaces to be cooled, and as a vehicle for conveying the heat so abstracted to the mechanically cooled gas. See ice-machine. (b) In a broader sense, a process of refrigeration in which the cycle of heat-changes is only partly produced by mechanical action, as in compression ice-machines using anhydrous ammonia, wherein the cooling of the vapor takes place entirely during the formation from the liquid, and is caused by absorption of the latent heat of vaporization from the sensible heat of the substance, the mechanical part of the process being wholly confined to compressing the ammonia-vapor while liquefying it under the action of cold and pressure. Such machines are very effective and quite extensively used.

refrigerative (rē-frij′e-rā-tiv), a. and n. [= OF. refrigeratif, F. réfrigératif = Sp. Pg. refrigerativo = It. refrigerativo, rifrigerativo; as refrigerate + -ive.] I. a. Cooling; refrigerant: as, a refrigerative treatment.

All lectuces are by nature refrigerative, and doe coole the bodie. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xix. 8.

II. n. A medicine that allays the sensation of heat; a refrigerant.

refrigerator (rē-frij′e-rā-tor), n. [< refrigerate + -or[1].] That which refrigerates, cools, or keeps cool; specifically, any vessel, chamber, or apparatus designed to keep its contents at a temperature little if at all above the freezing-point. In a restricted sense, a refrigerator is an inclosed chamber or compartment where meats, fish, fruit, or liquors, etc., are kept cool by the presence of ice or freezing-mixtures, or by the circulation of currents of cold air or liquid supplied by an ice-machine or a refrigerating-machine. Domestic refrigerators are made in a great variety of shapes, and may be either portable or built into the walls of a house. They range from the common ice-box (which in its simplest form is merely a metal-lined wooden box with facilities for drainage, kept partly filled with ice on which fish or meat may be kept) to large and elaborate ice-chests and ice-rooms. Small refrigerators are sometimes called ice-safes.—Anesthetic refrigerator. See anesthetic.

Refrigerator.

a, body of the refrigerator; b, paper sheathing; e, a shelf for supporting ice i; f, drip-pipe; g, air-trap; h, drip-pan; j, j′, lids covering ice-chamber; k, door of compartment containing shelves l, of corrugated galvanized iron, on which are supported the articles to be preserved by refrigeration; x, zinc lining.

refrigerator-car (rē-frij′e-rā-tor-kär), n. A freight-car fitted up for the preservation by means of cold of perishable merchandise. Such cars are supplied with an ice-chamber, and sometimes with a blower, which is driven by a belt from one axle of the car, and causes a constant circulation of air over the ice and through the car. A small portable organ, much used in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, consisting of one or sometimes two sets of reed-pipes played with keys for the player's right hand, with a small bellows for the left hand. Its compass included only a few tones. In many cases the instrument was made to shut up within covers, like a large book: hence the name Bible-organ. If there was but one pipe to each note, the instrument was called a single regal, if two pipes to each note, a double regal. The invention of the regal is often erroneously ascribed to Roll, an organ-builder of Nuremberg, in 1575; the instrument was common in England in the reign of Henry VIII. It is now obsolete, but the name is still applied in Germany to certain reed-stops

[= OF. regale, F. régale = Sp. regale = It. regalia, a royal privilege, prerogative, < ML. regale, royal power or prerogative, regalia, pl. (also as fem. sing.), royal powers, royal prerogatives, the ensigns of royalty, etc., neut. of L. regalis, regal, royal: see regal[1].] 1. A privilege, prerogative, or right of property pertaining to the sovereign of a state by virtue of his office. The regalia are usually reckoned to be six—namely, the power of judicature; of life and death; of war and peace; of masterless goods, as estrays, etc.; of assessments; and of minting of money.

The prerogative is sometimes called jura regalia or regalia, the regalia being either majora, the regal dignity and power, or minora, the revenue of the crown.
Encyc. Brit., XIX. 672.

2. In eccles. hist., the power of the sovereign in ecclesiastical affairs. In monarchical countries where the papal authority is recognized by the state, the regale is usually defined by a concordat with the papal see; in other monarchical countries it takes the form of the royal supremacy (see supremacy). In medieval times especially the regale involved the right of enjoyment of the revenues of vacant bishoprics, and of presentation to all ecclesiastical benefices or positions above the ordinary parochial cures during the vacancy of a see. These rights were exercised by the Norman and Plantagenet kings of England and by the French kings from the eleventh century onward with constantly widening application and increased insistence till the time of Louis XIV. Opposed to pontificale. See investiture.

They penetrated to Cowes for the race-balls and regatta gayeties. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xxxix.

regelate (rē'jē-lāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. regelated, ppr. regelating. [< L. regelatus, pp. of regelare (> It. regalare = Pg. regelar = F. regeler), air, cool off, < re-, back, + gelare, congeal: see geal[1].] To freeze or become congealed again; specifically, to freeze together.

Everything yields. The very glaciers are viscous, or regelate into conformity, and the stiffest patriots palter and compromise. Emerson, Fortune of the Republic.

regelation (rē-jē-lā'shon), n. [= F. regélation, a freezing over, < LL. regelatio(n-), a thawing, < L. regelare, thaw, warm, < re-, back, again, also = un-, + gelare, freeze: see regelate.] The phenomenon of congelation and cohesion exemplified by two pieces of melting ice when brought into contact at a temperature above the freezing-point. Not only does this occur in air, but also in water. The phenomenon, first observed by Faraday, is obscure.

Two pieces of ice at 32° Fahr., with moist surfaces, when placed in contact, freeze together to a rigid mass. This is called regelation. Faraday. (Webster.)

An attempt . . . has been made of late years to reconcile the brittleness of ice with its motion in glaciers. It is founded on the observation, made by Mr. Faraday in 1850, that when two pieces of thawing ice are placed together they freeze together at the place of contact. . . . The word Regelation was proposed by Dr. Hooker to express the freezing together of two pieces of thawing ice observed by Faraday; and the memoir in which the term was first used was published by Mr. Huxley and Mr. Tyndall in the Philosophical Transactions for 1857.
Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 164.

regence† (rē'jens), n. [= OF. regence, F. régence = Sp. Pg. regencia = It. reggenza, < ML. regentia, rule, < L. regen(t-)s, ruling: see regent.] Government; rule.

Some for the gospel, and massacres
Of spiritual affidavit-makers,
That swore to any human regence
Oaths of suprem'cy and allegiance.
S. Butler, Hudibras, III. ii. 275.

★regency (rē′jen-si), n.; pl. regencies (-siz). [As regence (see -cy).] 1. Rule; authority; government.

The sceptre of Christ's regency. Hooker.

2. More specifically, the office, government, or jurisdiction of a regent; deputed or vicarious government. See regent, 2.

The king's illness placed the queen and the duke of York in direct rivalry for the regency.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 349.

3. The district under the jurisdiction of a regent or vicegerent.

Regions they pass'd, the mighty regencies
Of seraphim. Milton, P. L., v. 748.

4. The body of men intrusted with vicarious government: as, a regency constituted during a king's minority, insanity, or absence from the kingdom.

By the written law of the land, the sovereign was empowered to nominate a regency in case of the minority or incapacity of the heir apparent.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 17.

5. The existence of a regent's rule; also, the period during which a regent administers the government.

I can just recall the decline of the grand era. . . . The ancient habitués, . . . contemporaries of Brummell in his zenith—boon companions of George IV. in his regency—still haunted the spot. Bulwer, My Novel, xi. 2.

To the forced and gloomy bigotry which marked the declining years of Louis Quatorze succeeded the terrible reaction of the regency and the following reigns.
W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 2d ser., p. 17.

6. The office of a university regent, or master regent.—7. The municipal administration of certain towns in northern Europe.—Albany regency, in U. S. hist., a group of politicians who, by the skilful use of patronage, controlled the nominating conventions and other machinery of the Democratic party in the State of New York, from about 1820 to about 1850. The most noted members were Wright, Martin Van Buren, Marcy, and Dix.—Regency Act, a name given to special statutes regulating regency, as, for instance, an English statute of 1840 (3 and 4 Vict., c. 52), which authorized the Prince Consort to act as regent, in case of the demise of Queen Victoria, during the minority of her successor.—The Regency, in French hist., the period of the minority of Louis XV., 1715–23, when Philip of Orleans was regent.

regendert (rē-jen′dėr), v. t. [< re- + gender. Cf. regenerate.] To gender again; renew.

Furth spirts fyre freshlye regendred.
Stanihurst, Æneid, ii. 496.

regeneracy (rē-jen′ę-rā-si), n. [< regenera(te) + -cy.] The state of being regenerated.

Though Saul were, yet every blasphemous sinner could not expect to be, called from the depth of sin to regeneracy and salvation. Hammond, Works, IV. 686.

★regenerate (rē-jen′ę-rāt), v. t. [< L. regeneratus, pp. of regenerare (> It. regenerare, rigenerare = Sp. Pg. regenerar = F. régénérer), generate again, < re-, again, + generare, generate: see generate.] 1. To generate or produce anew; reproduce.

In a divided worm, he [Bülow] says, the tail is regenerated from cell-layers developed in the same way and exactly equivalent to the three layers of the embryo.
Mind, IX. 417.

2. In theol., to cause to be born again; cause to become a Christian; give by direct divine influence a new spiritual life to. See regeneration, 2.

No sooner was a convert initiated . . . but by an easy figure he became a new man, and both acted and looked upon himself as one regenerated and born a second time.
Addison, Def. of Christ. Relig., ix. 2.

regenerate (rē-jen′ę-rāt), a. [= F. regénéré = Sp. Pg. regenerado = It. regenerato, rigenerato, < L. regeneratus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. Reproduced; restored; renewed.

O thou, the earthly author of my blood,
Whose youthful spirit, in me regenerate,
Doth with a twofold vigour lift me up.
Shak., Rich. II., i. 3. 70.

Who brought a race regenerate to the field, . . .
And raised fair Lusitania's fallen shield.
Scott, Vision of Don Roderick, Conclusion, st. 14.

2. In theol., begotten or born anew; changed from a natural to a spiritual state.

Seeing now . . . that this child is regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ's Church, let us give thanks unto Almighty God for these benefits.
Book of Common Prayer, Office of Public Baptism of [Infants.

regenerateness (rē-jen′ę-rāt-nes), n. The state ★of being regenerated. Bailey.

regeneration (rē-jen-ę-rā′shọn), n. [< ME. regeneracioun, < OF. regeneration, F. régénération = Sp. regeneración = Pg. regeneração = It. regenerazione, rigenerazione, < LL. regeneratio(n-), a being born again, regeneration: see regenerate.] 1. The act of regenerating or producing anew.—2. In theol.: (a) A radical change in the spirit of an individual, accomplished by the direct action of the Spirit of God. Evangelical theologians agree that there is a necessity for such a radical spiritual change in man in order to the divine life; but they differ widely in their psychological explanations of the change. They are, however, generally agreed that it consists of or at least necessarily involves a change in the affections and desires of the soul. Regeneration is also understood, as by the Roman Catholic Church, to be the gift of the germ of a spiritual life conferred regularly by God's ordinance in baptism, which is accordingly called the sacrament of regeneration, or simply regeneration. The word regeneration occurs only once in the New Testament in its ordinary theological meaning; but equivalent expressions are found, such as "begotten again," "born again," "born of God," "born of water and of the Spirit."

According to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost. Tit. iii. 5.

Baptism is . . . a sign of Regeneration or New-Birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive Baptism rightly are grafted into the Church.
Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, xxvii.

(b) The renovation of the world to be accomplished at the second coming of the Messiah.

Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Mat. xix. 28.

3. (rē-jen-ę-rā′shọn). In biol., the genesis or origination of new tissue to repair the waste of the body, or to replace worn-out tissue; also, the reproduction of lost or destroyed parts or organs. Regeneration of tissue constantly goes on in all animals in the ordinary repair of waste products of vital action; but the replacing of lost parts, as a limb, is nearly confined to animals below vertebrates, in many of which it is an easy or usual process, and to the very early stages in the development of vertebrates.—Baptismal ★regeneration. See baptismal.

regenerative (rē-jen′ę-rā-tiv), a. [= OF. regeneratif, F. regénératif = Sp. Pg. regenerativo; as regenerate + -ive.] 1. Producing regeneration; renewing.

She identified him with the struggling regenerative process in her which had begun with his action.
George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, lxv.

In Mahommedanism there is no regenerative power; it is "of the letter, which killeth" — unelastic, sterile, barren. Faiths of the World, p. 331.

2. In metal., on the principle of the Siemens regenerator, or so constructed as to utilize that method of economizing fuel, as in the term regenerative gas-furnace. See regenerator.—Regenerative burner. See burner.—Regenerative chamber, in a furnace, a regenerator.—Regenerative furnace. See furnace.

regeneratively (rē-jen′ę-rā-tiv-li), adv. In a ★regenerative manner; so as to regenerate.

regenerator (rē-jen′ę-rā-tọr), n. [= F. régénérateur, n.; as regenerate + -or[1].] 1. One who regenerates.

He is not his own regenerator, or parent at all, in his new birth. Waterland, Works, VI. 352.

All these social regenerators panted to be free.
The American, XIV. 23.

2. In metal., a chamber filled with a checkerwork of fire-bricks; that part of a regenerative furnace in which the waste heat of the gases escaping from the hearth is, by reversal of the draft at suitable intervals, alternately stored up and given out to the gas and air entering the furnace. The idea of employing what is now generally called the "regenerative system" of heating was first conceived by Robert Stirling, in 1816, but his arrangement for carrying it out was not a practical one. The present form of the furnace, and in general the successful application of the principle, constituting a highly important improvement in the consumption of fuel, are due to the brothers Siemens. The regenerative system has already been extensively applied in various metallurgical and manufacturing processes, and is likely to receive still further development. According to the Siemens regenerative method, there must be at least one pair of regenerative chambers, in order that the heat may be in process of being stored up in one while being utilized in the other. In the Siemens regenerative reheating- or mill-furnace there are two pairs of chambers, each pair consisting of one larger and one smaller chamber, through one of which the air passes, and through the other the gas on its way to the furnace. The so-called "Ponsard recuperator" is a form of regenerator in which, by an ingenious arrangement of solid and hollow fire-bricks, the current is made continuous in one direction, instead of requiring reversal as in the Siemens regenerative furnace. This form of furnace has been employed for reheating in rolling-mills.

regenerator-furnace (rē-jen′ę-rā-tọr-fėr″nās), n. Any form of furnace with which a regenerator is connected.

regeneratory (rē-jen′ę-rā-tọ-ri), a. [< regenerate + -ory.] Regenerative; having the power to renew; tending to reproduce or renovate.

regenesis (rē-jen′e-sis), n. [< re- + genesis.] The state of being renewed or reproduced.

There tended to be thereafter a continual regenesis of dissenting sects. H. Spencer, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 368.

regent (rē′jent), a. and n. [< OF. regent, F. régent = Sp. Pg. regente = It. reggente, ruling, as a noun a regent, vicegerent, < L. regen(t-)s, ruling; as a noun, a ruler, governor, prince; ppr. of regere, pp. rectus, direct, rule, correct, lit. 'make straight,' 'stretch,' = Gr. ὀρέγειν, stretch, = Skt. √ raj, stretch out, = Goth. uf-rakjan, stretch out, etc. (see rack[1]); cf. Skt. √ rāj, direct, rule, rājan, king, L. rex (rēg-), king (see rex). The two roots in Skt. may be orig. identical, as they have become in L. From the L. regere are also ult. regimen, regiment, régime, region, rector, rectum, rectangle, rectilineal, etc., correct, direct, erect, etc., dress, address, redress, etc. Related E. words of Teut. origin are right, rack[1], etc.] I. a. 1. Ruling; governing.

To follow nature's too affected fashion,
Or travel in the regent walk of passion.
Quarles, Emblems, ii. 4.

He together calls,
Or several, one by one, the regent powers,
Under him regent. Milton, P. L., v. 697.

Some other active regent principle that resides in the body. Sir M. Hale.

2. Exercising vicarious authority: as, a prince regent.—3. Taking part in the government of a university.—Queen regent. See queen.

II. n. 1. A ruler; a governor: in a general sense.

Uriel, . . . regent of the sun, and held
The sharpest-sighted spirit of all in Heaven.
Milton, P. L., iii. 690.

The moon (sweet regent of the sky)
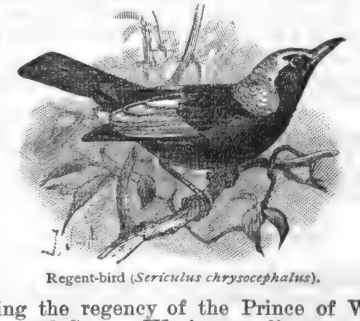
Silver'd the walls of Cumnor Hall.
Mickle, Cumnor Hall.

2. One who is invested with vicarious authority; one who governs a kingdom in the minority, absence, or disability of the king. In most hereditary governments this office is regarded as belonging to the nearest relative of the sovereign capable of undertaking it; but this rule is subject to many modifications.



I say, my sovereign, York is meetest man
To be your regent in the land of France.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., i. 3. 164.

3. In the old universities, a master or doctor who takes part in the regular duties of instruction or government. At Cambridge all resident masters of arts of less than four years' standing, and all doctors of less than two, are regents. At Oxford the period of regency is shorter. At both universities those of a more advanced standing, who keep their names on the college books, are called non-regents. At Cambridge the regents compose the upper house and the non-regents the lower house of the senate, or governing body. At Oxford the regents compose the congregation, which confers degrees and does the ordinary business of the university. The regents and non-regents collectively compose the convocation, which is the governing body in the last resort.

Only regents—that is, masters actually engaged in teaching—had any right to be present or to vote in congregations [at Bologna]. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 835.

4. In the State of New York, a member of the corporate body known as the University of the State of New York. The university is officially described as consisting "of all incorporated institutions of academic and higher education, with the State Library, State Museum, and such other libraries, museums, or other institutions for higher education in the state as may be admitted by the regents. . . . The regents have power to incorporate, and to alter or repeal the charters of colleges, academies, libraries, museums, or other educational institutions belonging to the University; to distribute to them all funds granted by the state for their use; to inspect their workings and require annual reports under oath of their presiding officers; to establish examinations as to attainments in learning, and confer on successful candidates suitable certificates, diplomas, and degrees, and to confer honorary degrees."—House of regents. See house[1].—Necessary regent, one who is obliged to serve as regent: opposed to a regent ad placitum, who has served the necessary term and is at liberty to retire.

regent-bird (rē′jent-bėrd), n. An Australian bird of the genus Sericulus, S. chrysocephalus or melinus, the plumage of which is velvety-black and golden-yellow in the male: so called during the regency of the Prince of Wales, afterward George IV., in compliment to him. It is related to the bower-birds, but has been variously classified. See Sericulus. Also regent-oriole.

Regent-bird (Sericulus chrysocephalus).

regentess (rē′jen-tes), n. [< regent + -ess.] A female regent; a protectress of a kingdom.

regent-oriole (rē′jent-ō″ri-ōl), n. Same as regent-bird.

regentship (rē′jent-ship), n. [< regent + -ship.] The office or dignity of a regent, especially of a vicegerent, or one who governs for a king; regency.

If York have ill demean'd himself in France,
Then let him be denay'd the regentship.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., i. 3. 107.

regerminate (rē-jėr′mi-nāt), v. i. [< L. regerminatus, pp. of regerminare, sprout again, < re-, again, + germinare, sprout, germinate: see germinate.] To germinate again.

regermination (rē-jėr-mi-nā′shọn), n. [< L. regerminatio(n-), < regerminare, pp. regerminatus, sprout again: see regerminate.] A sprouting or germination anew.

The Jews commonly express resurrection by regermination, or growing up again like a plant.
Gregory, Notes on Scripture, p. 125.

regest† (rē-jest′), v. t. [< L. regestus, pp. of regerere, throw or cast back, retort, also record, chronicle, < re-, back, + gerere, carry: see gest[2].] To throw back; retort.

Who can say, it is other than righteous, that thou shouldest regest one day upon us, Depart from me, ye wicked? Bp. Hall, Contemplations, iii. 5.

regest† (rē-jest′), n. [< F. (obs.) regeste, pl. regestes (= Pg. registo, resisto), a register, < L. regestum (pl. regesta), neut. of regestus, pp. of regerere, record: see regest, v. Cf. register[1].] A register.

Old legends and Cathedrall regests.
Milton, Hist. Eng., iii.

reget (rē-get′), v. t. [< re- + get[1].] 1. To get or obtain again.

And then desire in Gascoign to reget
The glory lost. Daniel, Civil Wars, vi. 71.

2†. To generate or bear again.

Tovy, although the mother of vs all,
Regetts [read regests?] thee in her wombe.
Davies, Scourge of Folly, p. 52. (Davies.)

reghte†, adv. A Middle English form of right.

regiam majestatem (rē′ji-am maj-es-tā′tem). [So called from these words at the beginning of the collection; L.: regiam, acc. fem. of regius, pertaining to a king, royal (< rex (reg-), king); majestatem, acc. of majestas, majesty: see majesty.] A collection of early laws, said to have been compiled by the order of David I., king of Scotland. It resembles so closely the Tractatus de Legibus, supposed to have been written by Glanvil in the reign of Henry II., that no doubt one was copied from the other.

regian† (rē′ji-an), n. [< L. regius, of a king (see regious), + -an.] 1. An adherent or upholder of regalism.

This is alleged and urged by our regians to prove the king's paramount power in ecclesiasticis.
Fuller, Ch. Hist., II. iii. 38.

2. A royalist.

Arthur Wilson . . . favours all Republicans, and never speaks well of regians (it is his own distinctions) if he can possibly avoid it.
Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, i. 39. (Davies.)

regible† (rej′i-bl), a. [= It. reggibile = Sp. regible, < LL. regibilis, that may be ruled, governable, tractable, < L. regere, rule: see regent.] Governable.

regicidal (rej′i-sī-dạl), a. [< regicide[2] + -al.] Consisting in, relating to, or having the nature of regicide; tending to regicide.

regicide[1] (rej′i-sīd), n. [= F. régicide = Sp. Pg. It. regicida, < L. rex (reg-), a king, + -cida, < cædere, kill.] A king-killer; one who puts a king to death; specifically, in Eng. hist., a member of the high court of justice constituted by Parliament for the trial of Charles I., by which he was found guilty of treason and sentenced to death in 1649.

The regicides who sat on the life of our late King were brought to tryal in the Old Bailey.
Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 11, 1660.

regicide[2] (rej′i-sīd), n. [= F. régicide = Sp. Pg. It. regicidio, the slaying of a king, < L. rex (reg-), king, + -cidium, a killing, < cædere, kill.] The killing of a king.

Did Fate, or we, when great Atrides dy'd,
Urge the bold traitor to the Regicide?
Fenton, in Pope's Odyssey, i. 48.

regifugium (rē-ji-fū′ji-um), n.; pl. regifugia (-ä). [= Pg. regifugio, < LL. regifugium, 'the king's flight,' < L. rex (reg-), king, + fuga, flight, < fugere, flee: see fugitive.] An ancient Roman annual festival, held, according to some ancient writers, in celebration of the flight of Tarquin the Proud.

regild (rē-gild′), v. t. [< re- + gild[1].] To gild anew.

★régime (rā-zhēm′), n. [< F. régime, < L. regimen, direction, government: see regimen.] 1. Mode, system, or style of rule or management; government, especially as connected with certain social features; administration; rule.

The industrial régime is distinguished from the predatory régime in this, that mutual dependence becomes great and direct, while mutual antagonism becomes small and indirect. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 525.

2. In French law, specifically, the system of property rights under the marriage relation, fixed upon by the parties by an ante-nuptial contract. The principal systems are régime de communauté (see community property, under community), régime de separation de biens, and régime dotal (see dot[2]).—Ancient régime [F. ancien régime], a former style or system of government; an ancient social system; specifically, the political and social system which prevailed in France before the revolution of 1789.

regimen (rej′i-men), n.; pl. regimens, regimina (rej′i-menz, rē-jim′i-nä). [= OF. regime, F. régime = Sp. régimen = Pg. regimen, regime = It. regimine, < L. regimen, guidance, direction, government, rule, < regere, rule: see regent. Cf. régime.] 1. Orderly government or system; system of order; government; control.

It concerneth the regimen and government of every man over himself, and not over others.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 278.

Time . . . restored the giddy revellers to the regimen of sober thought. O. W. Holmes, Emerson, xvi.

2. Any regulation or remedy which is intended to produce beneficial effects by gradual operation; specifically, in med., the regulation of diet, exercise, etc., with a view to the preservation or restoration of health, or for the attainment of a determinate result; a course of living according to certain rules: sometimes used as equivalent to hygiene, but most commonly used as a synonym for diet[1], 2.

My Father's disorder appeared to be a dropsy, an indisposition the most unsuspected, being a person so exemplaryly temperate, and of admirable regimen.
Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 30, 1640.

Yet I have heard you were ill yourself, and kept your bed: . . . this was (I imagine) only by way of regimen, and not from necessity. Gray, Letters, I. 340.

3. In zoöl., habit or mode of life with regard to eating; choice of food; dietetics: as, an animal or a vegetable regimen; carnivorous regimen.—4. In gram.: (a) Government; the control which one word exercises over the form of another in connection with it.

The grammarians posit the absence of regimen as one of the differential features of a conjunction.
F. Hall, False Philol., p. 84.

★(b) The word or words so governed.

regiment (rej′i-ment), n. [< ME. regiment, regement, < OF. regiment, regement, government, sway, later a regiment of soldiers, = Pr. regiment = Sp. regimiento, government, a regiment, = Pg. regimento = It. reggimento, < LL. regimentum, rule, government, < L. regere, rule: see regent. Cf. regimen, régime.] 1†. Rule; government; authority.

That for hens forth y[t] he be under the regement and gouernance of the Mayr and Aldermen of the same cite.
Charter of London, in Arnold's Chronicle, p. 43.

The first Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regiment of Women. Knox, title of work.

The regiment of Debora, who ruled twentie yeares with religion. Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 455.

2†. A district ruled; a kingdom.

The triple-parted regiment
That froward Saturn gave unto his sons.
Greene, Orlando Furioso.

3†. Rule of diet; regimen.

This may bring her to eat, to sleep, and reduce what's now out of square with her into their former law and regiment.
Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, iv. 3.

4. Milit., a unit consisting of two or more battalions or squadrons commanded by a field officer, usually a colonel. In the United States army the regiment has three battalions of infantry, three squadrons of cavalry, or two battalions of field artillery. In Great Britain the normal composition of a regiment of infantry in the regular army is two battalions, but several have a larger establishment. Abbreviated regt.

K. John. Up higher to the plain; where we'll set forth
In best appointment all our regiments.
Bast. Speed then, to take advantage of the field.
Shak., K. John, ii. 1. 295.

5. A large array or number.

In my small revolving of Authors, I find as high Virtue in Women as in Men; I could produce here a whole Regiment of them, but that a Letter is too narrow a field to muster them in.
Howell, Familiar Letters, ii. 24 (ed. of 1737).

Marching regiment. See march[2].—Royal regiment of artillery. See artillery.

regiment (rej′i-ment), v. t. [= Sp. regimentar, form into regiments; from the noun.] To form into a regiment or into regiments with proper officers; hence, to organize; bring under a definite system of command, authority, or interdependence.

If women were to be regimented, he would carry an army into the field without beat of drum.
Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, III. 314. (Davies.)

regimental (rej-i-men′tạl), a. and n. [= Pg. regimental; as regiment + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to a regiment: as, regimental officers; regimental clothing.

The band led the column, playing the regimental march.
Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xxx.

Regimental adjutant, fund, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. pl. (rarely used in the singular). Military clothing: so named from the former practice of discriminating the uniforms of different regiments very decidedly one from another—a fashion nearly abandoned at the present time.

If they had been ruled by me, they would have put you into the guards. You would have made a sweet figure in a regimental. Colman, Man of Business, ii. (Davies.)

You a soldier!—you're a walking block, fit only to dust the company's regimentals on.
Sheridan, The Rivals, iii. 1.

In their ragged regimentals
Stood the old Continentals,
Yielding not.
G. H. McMaster, Carmen Bellicosum.

regimentation (rej″i-men-tā′shọn), n. [< regiment, v., + -ation.] The act of forming into regiments, or the state of being formed into regiments or classified systems; organization.

The process of militant organization is a process of regimentation, which, primarily taking place in the army, secondarily affects the whole community.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 553.

regimina, n. Latin plural of regimen.

reginal (rē-jim′i-nal), a. [< L. regimen (regimin-), rule, + -al.] Of or pertaining to regimen: as, strict reginal rules.

Regina (rē-jī′nä), n. [NL. (Baird and Girard, 1853), < L. regina, a queen, fem. of rex (reg-), a king: see rex.] In herpet., a genus of watersnakes or aquatic harmless serpents of the family Colubridæ. The type is the striped watersnake of the United States, R. leberis.

Regina purple. See purple.

region (rē′jọn), n. [< ME. region, regioun, < ★OF. region, F. région = Pr. regio, reio = Sp. región = Pg. região = It. regione, a region, < L. regio(n-), a direction, line, boundary-line, boundary, territory, quarter, province, region, < regere, direct, rule: see regent.] 1. Any considerable and connected part of a space or surface; specifically, a tract of land or sea of considerable but indefinite extent; a country; a district; in a broad sense, place without special reference to location or extent: as, the equatorial regions; the temperate regions; the polar regions; the upper regions of the atmosphere.

Zit there is, toward the parties meridionales, many Contrees and many Regyouns. Mandeville, Travels, p. 262.

The regions of Artois, Wallon, and Picardy. Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 1. 9.

Gawain the while thro' all the region round
Rode with his diamond, wearied of the quest.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

2. An administrative division of a city or territory; specifically, such a division of the city of Rome and of the territory about Rome, of which the number varied at different times; a district, quarter, or ward (modern rione). Under Servius Tullius there were four regions in the city and twenty-six in the Roman territory.

The series of Roman Macedonia begins with coins of the regions issued by permission of the senate and bearing the name of the Macedonians, from 158 to 146 B. C.
Encyc. Brit., XVII. 640.

His [Alberic's] chief attention was given to the militia, which was still arranged in scholæ, and it is highly probable that he was the author of the new divison of the city [Rome] into twelve regions. Encyc. Brit., XX. 788.

Rome has seven ecclesiastical regions, each with its proper deacons, subdeacons, and acolytes. Each region has its own day of the week for high ecclesiastical functions, which are celebrated by each in rotation.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 509.

3. Figuratively, the inhabitants of a region or district of country.

All the regions
Do smilingly revolt. Shak., Cor., iv. 6. 102.

4. In anat., a place in or a part of the body in any way indicated: as, the abdominal regions.

Let it fall rather, though the fork invade
The region of my heart. Shak., Lear, i. 1. 147.

The mouth, and the region of the mouth, . . . were about the strongest feature in Wordsworth's face.
De Quincey (Personal Traits of Brit. Authors, Wordsworth).

5†. Place; rank; station; dignity.

He is of too high a region; he knows too much.
Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 2. 75.

6†. Specifically, the space from the earth's surface out to the orbit of the moon: properly called the elemental region.

The orb below
As hush as death, anon the dreadful thunder
Doth rend the region. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 509.

I should have fatted all the region kites
With this slave's offal. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 607.

7. In zoögeog., a large faunal area variously limited by different authors. Especially—(a) A realm; one of several primary divisions of the earth's surface, characterized by its fauna: as, the Palearctic or the Nearctic region. The term acquired specific application to certain large principal areas from its use in this sense by P. L. Sclater in 1857. Sclater's regions, adopted with little modification by Günther and Wallace, were six in number: the Palearctic, Ethiopian, Oriental or Indian, Australian, Nearctic, and Neotropical. (See these words.) Baird added a seventh, the West Indian, now considered a division of the Neotropical. In 1874 Sclater, following Huxley, recognized as primary divisions (1) Arctogæa, comprising the Palearctic, Ethiopian, Indian, and Nearctic regions; (2) Dendrogæa, represented by the Neotropical region; (3) Antarctogæa, with an Australasian region; and (4) Ornithogæa, with a New Zealand region. (b) A secondary faunal area, the primary being called a realm: as, the Antillean, Central American, and Brazilian regions of the American Tropical realm. In this sense it has been used by most American zoölogists. Various other divisions have been proposed, as by A. Murray in 1866, Huxley in 1868, W. T. Blanford in 1869, E. Blyth in 1871, A. Newton in 1875, T. Gill in 1878, and J. A. Allen in 1878. Each of the main divisions, however defined by different naturalists, is subdivided into several subregions or provinces, more or less minutely in different systems. Thus, for example, the Ethiopian region is divided by Newton into the Libyan, Guinean, Caffrarian, Mozambican, and Madagascarian subregions, and the Libyan subregion itself into the Arabian, Egyptian, Abyssinian, and Gambian provinces. The waters of the globe have been either included in the prime divisions based on the land faunas, or segregated in peculiar ones.—Abdominal regions. See abdominal.—Agrarian region, anal region. See the adjectives.—Axillary region, a region on the side of the thorax, extending from the axilla to a line drawn from the lower border of the mammary to that of the scapular region.—Basilar region, the region of the base of the skull.—Blue-grass region. See grass.—Broca's region. Same as Broca's convolution. See convolution.—Ciliary region, that part of the eyeball just back from the cornea which corresponds to the ciliary muscle and processes.—Clavicular region, the region on the front of the chest immediately over the clavicle.—Clypeal region. See clypeal.—Cordilleran region. See cordillera.—Cyclic, dorso-lumbar, epigastric, gluteal, hypogastric region. See the adjectives.—Hyomental region, the space between the lower jaw and the hyoid bone.—Hypochondriac region. (a) Of the abdomen. See abdominal regions. (b) Of the thorax, same as inframammary region.—Iliac region. See abdominal regions.—Indo-Pacific region. See Indo-Pacific.—Infra-axillary region, the region on the side of the chest extending from the axillary region to the free border of the ribs. Also called subaxillary region.—Infraclavicular region. See infraclavicular.—Infrahyoid region, the space between the hyoid bone and the sternum.—Inframammary region. See inframammary.—Infrascapular region, the region on the back of the thorax on either side of the median line below a horizontal line through the inferior angle of each scapula. Also called subscapular region.—Interscapular region, the region on the back of the thorax between the shoulder-blades.—Ischiorectal region, the space corresponding to the posterior part of the pelvic outlet.—Lenticulostriate region, the anterior parts of the lenticular and caudate nuclei and the intervening part of the internal capsule.—Lenticulothalamic region, the posterior part of the lenticular nucleus, the optic thalamus, and the intervening part of the internal capsule.—Lumbar region. See lumbar[1].—Mammary region, the region on the front of the chest extending from the upper border of the third to the upper border of the sixth rib.—Mesogastric region, the umbilical and right and left lumbar regions taken together.—Multiply-connected region, in math., a region such that between any two points of it several paths can be drawn which cannot be changed one into the other by gradual changes or variations without going out of the region in question.—Parasternal, pelvic, Polynesian, popliteal, precordial, etc., region. See the adjectives.—Region of calms. See calm[1].—Sternal region, superior and inferior. See sternal.—Subaxillary region. Same as infra-axillary region.—Subclavicular region. Same as infraclavicular region.—Submammary region. Same as inframammary region.—Subscapular region. Same as infrascapular region.—Suprahyoid region, the region of the front of the neck above the hyoid bone; the hyomental region.—Supramammary region. Same as infraclavicular region.—Suprascapular region, the region on the back above the spine of the scapula.—Suprasternal region. See suprasternal. =Syn. 1. Quarter, locality, clime, territory.

regional (rē′jon-al), a. [< F. régional = Sp. Pg. regional = It. regionale, < LL. regionalis, of or belonging to a region or province, < L. regio(n-), a region, province: see region.] 1. Of or pertaining to a particular region or place; sectional; topical; local.

The peculiar seasonal and regional distribution of hurricanes. The Atlantic, XLIX. 334.

2. Of or pertaining to division into regions, as in anatomy and zoögeography; topographical.

It is curious that the Japanese should have anticipated Europe in a kind of rude regional anatomy.
O. W. Holmes, Med. Essays, p. 224.

Regional anatomy. Same as topographical anatomy. See anatomy.

regionally (rē′jon-al-i), adv. With reference to a region or particular place; topically; locally; in zoögeog., with reference to faunal regions or areas.

He thought it was the duty of the surgeon to treat it regionally. Medical News, LII. 273.

The preservation of rock-oils in every formation, of every geological age, all over the world—subject, however, locally or regionally, to subsequent change or destruction.
Science, VIII. 233.

regionarius (rē″ji-ō-nā′ri-us), n.; pl. regionarii (-ī). [NL., < L. regio(n-), a region: see region.] A title given to various Roman Catholic ecclesiastics who are assigned to duty in or jurisdiction over certain regions or districts in the city of Rome.

regionary (rē′jon-ā-ri), a. [< region + -ary.] 1. Of or pertaining to a region or regions.

But to this they attributed their successes, namely, to the tropical and regionary deities, and their entertaining so numerous a train of gods and goddesses.
Evelyn, True Religion, I. 104.

2. Of or pertaining to a region or administrative district, especially of the city of Rome.—Regionary deacon. See deacon.

From the time of Honorius II., Rome had twelve regionary deacons. Rom. Cath. Dict., p. 714.

regionic (rē-ji-on′ik), a. [< region + -ic.] Same as regional. [Rare.]

A regionic association.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, IV. 758.

regioust (rē′ji-us), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. regio, < L. regius, kingly, royal, regal, < rex (reg-), a king: see rex.] Pertaining to a king; royal. J. Harrington.

register[1] (rej′is-tėr), n. [< ME. regester (= D. G. Sw. Dan. register), < OF. registre, F. registre, a record, register, = Pr. registre = Sp. registro = Pg. registro, registo, resisto = It. registro, a register, record, < ML. registrum, also registra, register, a register, an altered form of regestum, a book in which things are recorded, a register, orig. pl., L. regesta, things recorded, records, neut. pl. of regestus, pp. of regerere, record: see regest, n. and v. In the later senses 6–10, from the verb, and in part practically identical, as 'that which registers,' with register[2], 'one who registers': see register[2].] 1. An official written account or entry, usually in a book regularly kept, as of acts, proceedings, or names, for preservation or for reference; a record; a list; a roll; also, the book in which such a record is kept: as, a parish register; a hotel register.

Of soules fynde I nat in this registre.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1954.

Each time of sorrow is naturally evermore a register of all such grievous events as have happened either in or near about the same time. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 72.

2. In old Eng. law, a compilation of the forms of writs in use, both original and judicial, which seems to have grown up gradually in the hands of clerks and of copyists, and therefore to vary much in different copies. Harvard Law Review, Oct., 1889.—3. In com., a document issued by the customs authorities as evidence of a ship's nationality. See registration of British ships, under registration.—4. The printed list of signatures at the end of early printed books.—5. In music: (a) The compass or range of a voice or an instrument. (b) A particular series of tones, within the compass of a voice or of certain instruments, which is produced in the same way and with the same quality: as, the chest-register of the voice, or the chalumeau register of the clarinet. The vocal registers are distinguished by quality more than by pitch, since the same tone can often be produced in more than one register. The difference lies in the way in which the larynx is used, but the exact nature of the process is disputed. The so-called head-register and chest-register include tones that call the cavities of the head and chest respectively into decided sympathetic vibration. The different vocal qualities are also called the low, middle, and high registers, or the thick, middle, and thin registers, depending in the first case upon the pitch of the tones for which they are best suited, and in the second upon the supposed condition of the vocal cords in producing them, or the quality of the tones produced.

It is true that alto boys cannot be made effective when choir-masters prohibit the use of the chest register.
Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 73.

6. In organ-building: (a) Same as stop or stop-knob. (b) A perforated frame or board for holding a set of trackers in place.—7. A device for registering automatically the number of revolutions made or the amount of work done by machinery, or for recording the pressure of steam, air, or water, or other data, by means of apparatus deriving motion from the object or objects whose force, velocity, etc., it is desired to ascertain.—8. A contrivance for regulating the passage of heat or air, as the draft-regulating plate of a furnace, or the damper-plate of a locomotive engine; a perforated plate with valves governing the opening into a duct which admits warm air into a room for heat, or fresh air for ventilation, or which allows foul air to escape.

Look well to the register;
And let your heat still lessen by degrees.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

I should like to know if an artist could ever represent on canvas a happy family gathered round a hole in the floor called a register. C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 13.

9. In printing, exact adjustment of position in the presswork of books or papers printed on both sides of the leaf. When pages, columns, and lines are truly square, and back one another precisely on the leaf, or when two or more adjacent colors meet without impinging, they are said to be in register; otherwise, out of register.

10. The inner part of the mold in which types are cast.—11. In bookbinding, a ribbon fastened into a bound book to serve as a marker of place for the reader.—Anemometrographic register. See anemometer.—Army Register. See army-list, 1.—Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping. See Lloyd's.—Meteorological register. See meteorological table (a), under meteorological.—Morse register. Same as indicator, 1 (b).—Out of register. See def. 9.—Parish register, a book in which the births, deaths, and marriages that occur in a given parish are registered.—Register counties, in Eng. law, certain counties or parts of counties, including Middlesex except London, the North, East, and West Ridings of Yorkshire, and Kingston-upon-Hull, in which peculiar laws for registration of matters affecting land-titles are in force.—Register ship, a ship which once obtained permission by treaty to trade to the Spanish West Indies, and whose capacity, per registry, was attested before sailing.—Register thermometer. See thermometer.—Seamen's register, a record containing the number and date of registration of each foreign-going ship and her registered tonnage, the length and general nature of her voyage or employment, the names, ages, etc., of the master and crew, etc. [Eng.]—Ship's register, a document showing the ownership of a vessel and giving a general description of her. It is used as a permit issued by the United States government to give protection and identification to an American vessel in a foreign trade, being practically for the vessel what a deed is for a house.—To make register, in printing, to arrange on the press pages, plates, or woodcuts in colors exactly in their proper positions. =Syn. 1. Catalogue, etc. (see list[5]), chronicle, archives.

register[1] (rej′is-tėr), v. [< F. registrer = Pr. Sp. Pg. registrar = It. registrare, < ML. registrare, register; from the noun: see register[1], n.] I. trans. 1. To enter in a register; indicate by registering; record in any way.

Here are thy virtues shew'd, here register'd,
And here shall live forever.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, v. 2.

Many just and holy men, whose names
Are register'd and calendar'd for saints.
Tennyson, St. Simeon Stylites.

The gray matter of the nervous system is the part in which sensory impulses are received and registered.
Science, V. 258.

2. To mark or indicate on a register or scale.—3. In rope-making, to twist, as yarns, into a strand.—Light-registering apparatus. See light[1]. =Syn. 1. See record.

II. intrans. 1. To enter one's name, or cause it to be entered, in a register, as at a hotel, or in the registry of qualified voters.—2. In printing, etc.: (a) To correspond exactly in symmetry, as columns or lines of printed matter on opposite sides of a leaf, so that line shall fall upon line and column upon column. (b) To correspond exactly in position, as in color-printing, so that every different color-impression shall fall exactly in its proper place, forming no double lines, and neither leaving blank spaces nor passing the limits proper to any other color.—3. In organ-playing, same as registrate.

register[2] (rej′is-tėr), n. [An altered form, due to confusion with register[1], of registrer, now usually written registrar: see registrar.] 1. One who registers: same as registrar.

O comfort-killing Night! . . .
Dim register and notary of shame!
Shak., Lucrece, l. 765.

And hauing subscribed their names, certaine Registers copie the said Orations. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 439.

Specifically—2. In law: (a) An officer of a United States district court, formerly appointed under the United States bankruptcy act, for the purpose of assisting the judge in the performance of his duties under that act, by attending to matters of detail and routine, or purely administrative in their character. Bump. (b) In some parts of the United States, an officer who receives and records deeds so as to give public notice thereof.—Lord register, or lord clerk register, a Scottish officer of state who has the custody of the archives.—Register in bankruptcy. Same as bankruptcy commissioner (which see, under bankruptcy).—Register of deeds, in the United States, a public officer who records at length deeds, conveyances, and mortgages of real estate situated within a given district.—Register of probate or of wills, in some of the United States, a public officer who records all wills admitted to probate.—Register of the Treasury, an officer of the Treasury Department of the United States government, who has charge of the account-books of the United States, registers all warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the treasurer, signs and issues all government securities, and has charge of the registry of vessels.

registerable (rej'is-tėr-a-bl), a. [< register[1] + -able.] Admitting of registration, or of being registered or recorded. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 26.

registered (rej'is-tėrd), p. a. Recorded, as in a register or book; enrolled: as, a registered voter (one whose name is duly entered in the official list of persons qualified to vote in an election).—Registered bond, invention, letter, etc. See the nouns.—Registered company, a company entered in an official register, but not incorporated by act or charter.

registerer† (rej'is-tėr-ėr), n. One who registers; a registrar.

register-grate (rej'is-tėr-grāt), n. A grating of parallel bars, fitted with a second grating which can be slid over the first, so as to vary the openings between the bars. Used as a means of controlling the air-admission to fires, and the rate of combustion.

registering (rej'is-tėr-ing), n. [Verbal n. of register, v.] Same as registration.

register-office (rej'is-tėr-of″is), n. 1. An office where a register is kept, or where registers or records are kept; a registry; a record-office.—2. An agency for the employment of domestic ★servants. [U. S.]

register-plate (rej'is-tėr-plāt), n. In rope-making machines, a concave metallic disk having holes so arranged concentrically as to give the yarns passed through them the proper positions for entering into the general twist.

register-point (rej'is-tėr-point), n. The adjustable point or spur attached to a printing-press and used to aid in getting register. See point[1], 2 (c).

registership (rej'is-tėr-ship), n. [< register[2] + -ship.] The office of a register or registrar.

registrable (rej'is-tra-bl), a. [< register[1] + -able.] Admitting of registration; that may or can be registered. Lancet, No. 3474, p. 733.

registrar (rej'is-trär), n. [Formerly registrer; < ME. registrere, < ML. registrarius, one who keeps a register or record, a registrar, notary, < registrum, a register, record: see register[1]. Cf. registrary and register[2]. Cf. also OF. registreur, registrateur, < ML. registrator, < registrare, register.] 1. One whose business it is to write or keep a register or record; a keeper of records.

I make Pieres the Plowman my procuratour and my reve,
And regystrere to receyue. Piers Plowman (B), xix. 254.

The patent was sealed and delivered, and the person admitted sworne before the registrar.
T. Warton, Bathurst, p. 136.

registrar-general (rej'is-trär-jen'ė-ral), n. An officer who superintends a system of registration; specifically, in Great Britain, an officer appointed by the crown, under the great seal, to whom is intrusted, subject to such regulations as shall be made by a principal secretary of state, the general superintendence of the system of registration of births, deaths, and marriages.

registrarship (rej'is-trär-ship), n. [< registrar + -ship.] The office of registrar.

registrary (rej'is-trā-ri), n.; pl. registraries (-riz). [< ML. registrarius, one who registers: see registrar.] A registrar. The registrar of the University of Cambridge is so called.

Lo, hither commyth a goodly maystres, Occupacyon, Famys regestary.
Skelton, Garland of Laurel, l. 521.

registrate (rej'is-trāt), v.; pret. and pp. registrated, ppr. registrating. [< ML. registratus, pp. of registrare, register: see register[1], v.] I.† trans. To register; enroll.

Why do ye toil to registrate your names
On icy pillars, which soon melt away?
Drummond, Flowers of Sion.

II. intrans. In organ-playing, to arrange or draw stops for playing; make or set a combination. See registration, 3. Also register.

registrate†, a. Registered; recorded.

Those madrigals we sung amidst our flocks . . .
Are registrate by echoes in the rocks.
Drummond, To Sir W. Alexander.

registration (rej-is-trā'shon), n. [< OF. registration, < ML. registratio(n-), a registering, < registrare, register: see registrate and register[1], v.] 1. The act of inserting or recording in a register; the act of recording in general: as, the registration of deeds; the registration of births, deaths, and marriages; the registration of voters.

Man's senses were thus indefinitely enlarged as his means of registration were perfected.
J. Fiske, Idea of God, p. 48.

2. Specifically, in the law of conveyancing, a system for the recording of conveyances, mortgages, and other instruments affecting the title to real property, in a public office, for the information of all concerned. The general policy of registry laws is to make a duly registered instrument notice to all the world, so that no one can claim any advantage over the registered owner by dealing with an unregistered owner or claimant in ignorance of the registered title. Under some systems a specified time is allowed for registering; and in some neglect to register an instrument within the time limited marks it with infirmity. The more generally accepted principle is to give effect to each instrument in the order of its registration, as against all unregistered instruments of which the purchaser, etc., had no actual notice. Another important element in registry laws is a provision that the record or certified copy shall be evidence in all courts equally as the original; but in some systems the non-production of the original must be accounted for before the record can be received in lieu of it.

3. In organ-playing, the act, process, art, or result of selecting or combining stops for playing given pieces of music. It includes every effect of light and shade, of quality or power, that is needed for a complete rendering, including the choice of manuals, the drawing and retiring of stops, and the use of all mechanical accessories, like couplers, the swell pedal, etc. In most recent organ-music the registration is somewhat carefully indicated by the composer or editor, but organs are so diverse that every player must interpret such marks for himself. Older music is usually unmarked, and the registration requires special study as well as special talent.—Decree of registration. See decree.—Parliamentary Registration Act, an English statute of 1843 (6 and 7 Vict., c. 18), which requires the registration of voters and defines certain rights of voting. It has been amended by later statutes.—Registration Act. (a) An English statute of 1885 (48 Vict., c. 15), which extends the borough system of registration of voters to county voters. (b) One of numerous American statutes in various States, providing for registration, and often requiring it as a condition of the right to vote.—Registration of births, marriages, and deaths, the system of collecting vital statistics by requiring attending physicians, etc., in case of births and deaths, and clergymen and magistrates solemnizing marriages, to report at once each case, with appropriate particulars, to the public authorities, for the purpose of preserving permanent and systematic records.—Registration of British ships, a duty imposed on ship-owners in order to secure to their vessels the privileges of British ships. Registration is to be made by the principal officer of customs at any port or place in the United Kingdom, and by certain specified officers in the colonies. The registration comprises the name of the ship, the names and descriptions of the owners, the tonnage, build, and description of the vessel, the particulars of her origin, and the name of the master, who is entitled to the custody of the certificate of registry. The vessel is considered to belong to the port at which she is registered.—Registration of copyright, the name given in England to the recording of the title of a book for the purpose of securing the copyright: corresponding to entry of copyright in the United States.—Registration of trade-marks, the system by which one claiming the exclusive right to a trade-mark may register it for the purpose of giving public notice of his claim, and preserving record evidence thereof from the time of entry.—Registration of voters or electors. (a) In the United States, a system for the prevention of frauds in the exercise of the suffrage, by requiring voters to cause their names to be registered in books provided for the purpose in each election district, with appropriate particulars of residence, age, etc., to enable investigation to be made, and the right of the voter to cast the ballot to be challenged, if there be occasion. (b) In Great Britain and Ireland, the making up of a list of voters which, after judicial revision, is the accredited record of an elector's title to vote.

registrational (rej-is-trā'shon-al), a. [< registration + -al.] Of or pertaining to registration. Lancet, No. 3457, p. 1135.

registry (rej'is-tri), n.; pl. registries (-triz). [Early mod. E. also regestery, regestary; < ME. regestery, < ML. regestarium*, < regestum, a register: see register[1].] 1. The act of recording or writing in a register, or depositing in the place of public record: as, the registry of a deed; the registry of a will, etc.—2. The place where a register is kept.—3. A series of facts recorded; a record.

I have sometimes wondered why a registry has not been kept in the colleges of physicians of all such [specific remedies] as have been invented by any professors of every age. Sir W. Temple, Health and Long Life.

Our conceptions are but the registry of our experience, and can therefore be altered only by being temporarily annihilated. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 59.

Certificate of registry. See certificate, 2.—District registry, in Eng. law, an office in a provincial town for the transaction or record of steps incidental to litigation by attorneys within the district, in order to avoid the necessity of taking every step in the central offices in London.

regitive† (rej'i-tiv), a. [Irreg. < L. regere, rule (see regent), + -itive.] Ruling; governing.

Their regitive power over the world.
Gentleman's Calling, vii. § 5. (Latham.)

regium donum (rē'ji-um dō'num). [L.: regium, neut. of regius, royal (see regious); donum, a gift, grant: see donate.] A royal grant; specifically, an annual grant of public money formerly given in aid of the maintenance of the Presbyterian and other dissenting clergy in Ireland, commuted in 1869 for £791,372.

Of regular justice in your city's bounds,
But shall be rendered to your public laws.
Shak., T. of A., v. 4. 61.

True Courage must be a Regular thing; it must have not only a good End, but a wise Choice of Means.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, III. v.

This gentleman is a person of good sense, and some learning, of a very regular life, and obliging conversation.
Addison, Spectator, No. 106.

3. Specifically, in law, conformable to law and the rules and practice of the court.—4. In math., governed by one law throughout. Thus, a regular polygon is one which has all its sides and all its angles equal; a regular body is one which has all its faces regular polygons, and all its summits formed by the junction of equal numbers of edges, those of each summit being equally inclined to one line.

5. In gram., adhering to the more common form in respect to inflectional terminations, as, in English, verbs forming their preterits and past participles by the addition of -d or -ed to the infinitive; as nouns forming their plurals with -s or -es; as the three conjugations of French verbs known as regular; and so on.—6. Belonging to and subject to the rule of a monastic order; pertaining to a monastic order: as, regular clergy, in distinction from secular clergy.

As these chanouns regulers,
Or white monkes, or these blake.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 6694.

7. Specifically, in bot., having the members of each circle of floral organs (sepals, petals, stamens, and pistils) normally alike in form and size: properly restricted to symmetry of form, as distinguished from symmetry of number.—8. In zoöl., noting parts or organs which are symmetrically disposed. See Regularia.—9. In music: (a) Same as strict: as, regular form; a regular fugue, etc. (b) Same as similar: as, regular motion.—10. Milit., permanent; standing: opposed to volunteer: said of an army or of troops.—11. In U. S. politics, of, pertaining to, or originating from the recognized agents or "machinery" of a party: as, a regular ticket.—12. Thorough; out-and-out; perfect; complete: as, a regular humbug; a regular deception; a regular brick. [Colloq.]—Regular abbot, body, canon. See the nouns.—Regular benefice, a benefice which could be conferred only on a regular priest.—Regular curve. (a) A curve without contrary flexure. (b) A curve defined by the same equation or equations throughout.—Regular decagon, dodecagon, dodecahedron. See the nouns.—Regular function, a function connected with the variable by the same general law for all values of the latter.—Regular physician, a practitioner of medicine who has acquired an accepted grade of knowledge of such things as pertain to the art of healing, and who does not announce himself as employing any single and peculiar rule or method of treatment, in contrast with the allopath (if such there be), homeopath, botanic physician, hydropath, electrician, or mind-cure practitioner. But nothing in his character of regular physician prevents his using drugs which may be made to produce in a healthy person effects opposite to or similar to those of the disease in hand, or using drugs of vegetable origin, or water in its various applications, or electricity, or recognizing the tonic effects of faith.—Regular place, a place within the precincts of a religious house.—Regular polygon, polyhedron. See the nouns.—Regular proof, a proof drawn up in strict form, with all the steps accurately stated in their proper order.—Regular relation. See relation.—Regular sales, in stock-broking and similar transactions, sales for delivery on the following day.—Regular syllogism, a syllogism set forth in the form usual in the books of logic, the major premise first, then the minor premise, and last the conclusion, each proposition being formally stated, with the same expressions used for the terms in the different propositions, and the construction of the proposition being that which logic contemplates.—The regular system, in crystal., the isometric system.=Syn. 1. Ordinary, etc. See normal.—2. Systematic, uniform, periodic, settled, established, stated.

II. n. 1. A member of any duly constituted religious order which is bound by the three monastic vows.

They declared positively that he [Archbishop Abbot] was not to fall from his Dignity or Function, but should still remain a Regular, and in statu quo prius.
Howell, Letters, I. iii. 7.

As in early days the regulars sustained Becket and the seculars supported Henry II. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 405.

2. A soldier who belongs to a standing army, as opposed to a militiaman or volunteer; a professional soldier.

He was a regular in our ranks; in other services only a volunteer. Sumner, John Pickering.

3. In chron.: (a) A number attached to each year such that added to the concurrents it gives the number of the day of the week on which the paschal full moon falls. (b) A fixed number attached to each month, which assists in ascertaining on what day of the week the first day of any month fell, or the age of the moon on the first day of any month.—College of regulars. See college.—Congregation of Bishops and Regulars. See congregation, 5 (a) (8).

Regularia (reg-ū-lā'ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. regularis, regular: see regular.] Regular sea-urchins, with biserial ambulacral plates, centric mouth, and aboral anus interior. Also called Endocyclica.

regularise, v. t. See regularize.

regularity (reg-ū-lar'i-ti), n. [< OF. regularite, regularete, F. régularité = Sp. regularidad = Pg. regularidade = It. regolarità, < ML. regularita(t-)s*, < L. regularis, regular: see regular.] The state or character of being regular, in any sense: as, regularity of a plan or of a building; regularity of features; the regularity of one's attendance at church; the watch goes with great regularity.

He was a mighty lover of regularity and order.
Bp. Atterbury.

There was no regularity in their dancing.
E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, II. 212.

Regularity and proportion appeal to a primary sensibility of the mind. A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 236.

regularization (reg″ū-lär-i-zā'shon), n. [< regularize + -ation.] The act or process of regularizing, or making regular; the state of being made regular. [Rare.]

At present (1885), a scheme combining the two systems of regularization and canalization is being carried out, for the purpose of securing everywhere at low water a depth of 5 feet 3 inches. Encyc. Brit., XX. 528.

An ancient Chinese law, moreover, prescribed the regularization of weights and measures at the spring equinox.
Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 792.

regularize (reg'ū-lär-īz), v. t. [< F. régulariser; as regular + -ize.] To make regular.

The labor bestowed in regularizing and modulating our language had operated not only to impoverish it, but to check its growth. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 282.

Their [the alkaline metals'] mode of action is greatly regularised by being made into amalgam with mercury.
W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico-printing, p. 440.

Also spelled regularise.

regularly (reg'ū-lär-li), adv. In a regular manner, in any sense of the word regular.

regularness (reg'ū-lär-nes), n. Regularity.

Long crystals . . . that did emulate native crystal as well in the regularness of shape as in the transparency of the substance. Boyle, Works, III. 530.

regulatable (reg′ū-lā-ta-bl), a. [< regulate + -able.] Capable of being regulated. E. H. Knight.

regulate (reg′ū-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. regulated, ppr. regulating. [< L. regulatus, pp. of regulare (> It. regolare = Sp. reglar, regular = Pg. regular, regrar = F. régler), direct, rule, regulate, < regula, rule: see rule[1]. Cf. regle, rail[2], v.] 1. To adjust by rule, method, or established mode; govern by or subject to certain rules or restrictions; direct.

If we think to regulat Printing, thereby to rectifie manners, we must regulat all recreations and pastimes, all that is delightfull to man. Milton, Areopagitica, p. 23.

When I travel, I always choose to regulate my own supper. Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, ii. 1.

One of the settled conclusions of political economy is that wages and prices cannot be artificially regulated. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 501.

2. To put or keep in good order: as, to regulate the disordered state of a nation or its finances; to regulate the digestion.

You must learn by trial how much half a turn of the screw accelerates or retards the watch per day, and after that you can regulate it to the utmost nicety. Sir E. Beckett, Clocks, Watches, and Bells, p. 300.

3. Specifically, in musical instruments with a keyboard, so to adjust the action that it shall be noiseless, prompt, and sensitive to the touch. =Syn. 1. Rule, Manage, etc. See govern.

regulating (reg′ū-lā-ting), n. 1. The act indicated by the verb regulate. Specifically—2. In rail., the work in the yard of making up trains, storing cars, etc.; drilling or switching.

regulating-screw (reg′ū-lā-ting-skrō), n. In organ-building, a screw by which the dip of the ★ digitals of the keyboard may be adjusted.

regulation (reg-ū-lā′shon), n. and a. [= F. régulation = Sp. regulación = Pg. regulação = It. regolazione, < ML. regulatio*(n-), < regulare, regulate: see regulate.] I. n. 1. The act of regulating, or the state of being regulated or reduced to order.

No form of co-operation, small or great, can be carried on without regulation, and an implied submission to the regulating agencies. H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 39.

2. A rule or order prescribed by a superior or competent authority as to the actions of those under its control; a governing direction; precept; law: as, police regulations; more specifically, a rule prescribed by a municipality, corporation, or society for the conduct of third persons dealing with it, as distinguished from (a) by-law, a term which is generally used rather with reference to the standing rules governing its own internal organization and the conduct of its officers and members, and (b) ordinance, which is generally used in the United States for the local legislation of municipalities.—3. In musical instruments with a keyboard, the act or process of adjusting the action so that it shall be noiseless, prompt, and sensitive to every variation of touch.—Army regulations. See army[2].—General regulations, a system of ordinances for the administration of the affairs of the army, and for better prescribing the respective duties and powers of officers and men in the military service, and embracing all forms of a general character. Ives. =Syn. 1. Disposition, ordering, adjustment.—2. Ordinance, Statute, etc. See law[1].

II. a. Having a fixed or regulated pattern or style; in accord with a rule or standard. [Colloq.]

The regulation mode of cutting the hair. Dickens, Oliver Twist, xviii.

My regulation saddle-holsters and housings. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xxx.

regulation (reg-ū-lā′shon), v. t. [< regulate + -ion.] To bring under regulations; cause to conform to rules. [Rare.]

The Javanese knows no freedom. His whole existence is regulationed. Quoted in Encyc. Brit., XIII. 604.

regulative (reg′ū-lā-tiv), a. [< regulate + -ive.] Regulating; tending to regulate.

Ends and uses are the regulative reasons of all existing things. Bushnell, Sermons for New Life, p. 12.

It is the aim of the Dialectic to show . . . that there are certain ideas of reason which are regulative of all our empirical knowledge, and which also limit it. E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 197.

Regulative faculty, Sir W. Hamilton's name for the faculty of principles; the noetic faculty.—Regulative idea, a conception resulting from or carrying with it a regulative principle.—Regulative principle. (a) In logic, the leading principle of an argumentation or inference; that general proposition whose truth is required to justify the habit of inference which has given rise in any case to the particular inference of which this proposition is said to be the regulative principle: opposed to constitutive principle, or pre-major premise. [This use of the term originated in the fifteenth century.]

Which be the principles irregulatiue? The Principles regulatiue of a syllogisme be these two phrases of speech: to be spoken of all, and to be spoken of none. Blundeville, Arte of Logicke (ed. 1619), v. 1.

(b) Since Kant, a rule showing what we ought to assume, without giving any assurance that the fact to be assumed is true; or a proposition which will lead to the truth if it be true, while if it be false the truth cannot be attained: such, for example, is the rule that we must not despair of answering any question by sufficient investigation. (c) A rule of conduct which, if it be pursued, may lead us to our desired end, while, if it be not pursued, that end cannot be attained in any way.—Regulative use of a conception. See constitutive use of a conception, under constitutive.

regulator (reg′ū-lā-tor), n. [= F. régulateur = Sp. Pg. regulador = It. regolatore, < ML. regulator, a regulator, ruler, < regulare, regulate: see regulate.] 1. One who or that which regulates. Members of the unauthorized associations which have at various times been formed in parts of the United States for the carrying out of a rough substitute for justice in the case of heinous or notorious crimes have been called regulators.

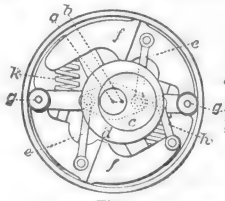
2. A mechanical contrivance intended to produce uniformity of motion, temperature, power, etc. (a) In engin. and mach.: (1) A governor in the sense described and illustrated under governor, 6. (2) A governor employed to control the closing of the port-opening for admission of steam to the cylinder of an automatically variable cut-off steam-engine. This is a numerous class of regulators, in which the ball-governor described under governor, 6, is used to control the motion of the induction-valve instead of that of the throttle-valve. By leaving the throttle-valve fully open and closing the induction-valve earlier or later in the stroke, the steam arrives in the cylinder nearly at full pressure, and with its full store of available heat for conversion into work by expansion. (3) An arrangement of weights, springs, and an eccentric or eccentrics, carried on the fly-wheel shaft or on the fly-wheel of a steam-engine, connected with the stem of the induction-valve by an eccentric-rod, and automatically varying a, fly-wheel shaft; a, b, and a, b′, eccentricities in different positions of the eccentrics c and d. The eccentric c turns freely on the shaft a, and is actuated by links e, that are pivoted to ears formed on the eccentric, and are also pivoted to weights f. The weights have the form of curved bars, and are pivoted at one end to spokes of the wheel, as shown at g. The eccentric d is fitted to and turns freely upon the perimeter of the eccentric c. It is also connected by a link h to the toe of one of the weights, and is rotated on c by the motion of the weight toward or away from the center of the shaft a. The eccentric c is also rotated on the shaft a by the motion of the weights to or from the center of the shaft, but it is turned in a direction opposite to that in which d is turned. These two eccentricities, therefore, constitute a compound eccentric, the eccentricity or "throw" of which varies with the position of the weights, while the "lead" remains practically the same. Coiled springs k constantly press the weights f toward the center, and the action of these springs is more or less overcome by centrifugal force as the shaft a rotates with greater or less velocity. The higher the velocity the less will be the throw of the valve and the shorter the cut-off, and vice versa. Fig. 1 shows the weights in their extreme outward position, in which the throw ab is the least possible. Fig. 2 shows the extreme inward position of the weights, in which the throw ab′ is the greatest possible. The range of variable cut-off is thus carried from simple lead to 0.7 of the stroke, and a very small percentage of change in the velocity is sufficient to change the cut-off from its least to its greatest limit.



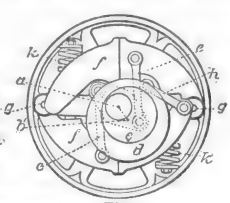


Fig. 1.

the cut-off, maintaining a uniform speed of rotation under conditions of widely varying work. One of the most ingenious and scientific of this class is illustrated in the cut with an accompanying explanation. (4) A throttle-valve. (5) The induction-valve of a steam-engine. (6) The brake-band of a crab or crane which regulates the descent of a body raised by or suspended on a machine. (b) In heating apparatus: (1) A register. (2) A thermostat. (3) An automatic draft-damper for the furnace or fire-box of a steam-boiler. Also called damper-regulator. (c) In horol.: (1) A clock of superior order, by comparison with which other time-pieces are regulated. (2) A clock which, being electrically connected with other clocks at a distance, causes them to keep time in unison with it. (3) A device (commonly a screw and small nut) by which the bob of a pendulum is raised or lowered, causing the clock to go faster or slower. (4) The fly of the striking mechanism of a clock. (See fly[1], 3 (a) (1).) (5) A small lever which shortens or lengthens the hair-spring of a watch, thus causing the watch to go faster or slower according as the regulator is moved toward a part marked F. or S. (d) In the electric light, the contrivance, usually an electromagnet, by which the carbon-points are kept at a constant distance, so that the light is steady (see electric light, under electric); a contrivance for making the current or the voltage produced by the dynamo-machines of constant strength.—Many-light regulator, a regulator for voltaic arc-lights, controlling numerous lights on one circuit.—Regulator-box. (a) A valve-chest or -box. (b) The original valve-motion of Watt's double-action condensing pumping-engine. It was a valve-box having a spindle through one of its sides, on which was a toothed sector working on a central bearing, and meshing with a rack attached to a valve. A tripping-lever attached to the sector and operated by the plug-tree caused the oscillations of the latter to open and close the valve.—Regulator-cock, one of the oil-cocks which admit oil to the steam-chest or valve-chest of a locomotive engine.—Regulator-cover, the cover or bonnet of a valve-chest or steam-chest of a steam-engine cylinder.—Regulator-shaft and -levers, in locomotive engines, the shaft and levers placed in front of the smoke-box when each cylinder has a separate regulator: now collectively called valve-gear or valve-motion.—Regulator-valve, a throttle-valve.

regulatory (reg′ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [< regulate + -ory.] Tending to regulate; regulative. N. Y. Med. Jour., XL. 476.

regulatress (reg′ū-lā-tres), n. [< regulator + -ess.] A female regulator; a directrix. Knight, Anc. Art and Myth. (1876), p. 99.

Regulinæ (reg-ū-lī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Regulus + -inæ.] The kinglets as a subfamily of Sylviidæ (or of Turdidæ), typified by the genus Regulus. They are only 4 or 5 inches long, generally with a conspicuous colored crest. The tarsi are booted, and the first primary is strictly spurious. The species are numerous, and inhabit chiefly the Old World. Sometimes Regulidæ, as a separate family.

reguline[1] (reg′ū-lin), a. [< F. régulin, having the character of regulus, the condition of perfect purity; as regulus + -ine[1].] Of or pertaining to a regulus.

The reguline condition is that of the greater number of deposits made in electrometallurgy. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXIX. 90.

reguline[2] (reg′ū-lin), a. In ornith., of or pertaining to the Regulinæ.

regulize (reg′ū-līz), v. t.; pret. and pp. regulized, ppr. regulizing. [< regulus + -ize.] To reduce to regulus.

regulus (reg′ū-lus), n.; pl. reguli (-lī). [< L. regulus, a little king, a king's son, a king bee, a small bird so called, LL. a kind of serpent, ML. regulus, metallic antimony, later also applied to various alloys and metallic products; dim. of rex (reg-), a king: see rex.] 1. In ornith.: (a) An old name of the goldcrest or crested wren of Europe; a kinglet. (b) [cap.] [NL.] The typical genus of Regulinæ; the kinglets. The common goldcrest of Europe is R. cristatus (see cut under goldcrest); the fire-crested wren of the same country is R. ignicapillus. The corresponding species of America is the golden-crowned kinglet, R. satrapa. The ruby-crowned kinglet is R. calendula. See kinglet.

2. In alchemy and early chemistry, the reduced or metallic mass obtained in the treatment of various ores, particularly those of the semimetals (see metal); especially, metallic antimony (regulus antimonii): but various alloys of antimony, other brittle metals, and even the more perfect metals were also occasionally so called, to indicate that they were in the metallic condition.—3. [cap.] [NL. (Copernicus), tr. Gr. βασιλίσκος, the name of the star in Ptolemy.] A very white star, of magnitude 1.4, on the heart of the Lion; a Leonis.—4. In geom., a ruled surface or singly infinite system of straight lines, where consecutive lines do not intersect.—Dalmatian regulus. See Dalmatian.

regur, regar (rē′gėr, rē′gär), n. [Hind. rēgar, prop. rēgada, rēgadi, black loam (see def.), < reg, sand.] The name given in India to a dark-colored, loamy, superficial deposit or soil rich in organic matter, and often of very considerable thickness. It is distinguished by its fineness and the absence of forest vegetation, thus resembling in character the black soil of southern Russia (tschernozem) and of the prairies of the Mississippi valley.

regurgitant (rē-gėr′ji-tant), a. [< ML. regurgitan(t-)s, ppr. of regurgitare, regurgitate: see regurgitate.] Characterized by or pertaining to regurgitation.

The diseases of the valves and orifices of the heart which produce mechanical disorders of the circulation . . . are of two kinds, obstructive and regurgitant. Quain, Med. Dict., p. 623.

Regurgitant cardiac murmurs. See murmur.

regurgitate (rē-gėr′ji-tāt), v.; pret. and pp. regurgitated, ppr. regurgitating. [< ML. regurgitatus, pp. of regurgitare (> It. regurgitare = Sp. Pg. regurgitar = OF. regurgiter, F. régurgiter), regurgitate, < LL. re-, back, + gurgitare, engulf, flood: see gurgitation.] I. trans. To pour or cause to rush or surge back; pour or throw back in great quantity.

For a mammal, having its grinding apparatus in its mouth, to gain by the habit of hurriedly swallowing unmasticated food, it must also have the habit of regurgitating the food for subsequent mastication. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 297.

II. intrans. To be poured back; surge or rush back.

Many valves, all so situate as to give a free passage to the blood and other humours in their due channels, but not permit them to regurgitate and disturb the great circulation. Bentley.

Nature was wont to evacuate its vicious blood out of these veins, which passage being stopt, it regurgitates upwards to the lungs. Harvey.

regurgitation (rē-gėr-ji-tā′shon), n. [= F. régurgitation = Sp. regurgitación = Pg. regurgitação, < ML. regurgitatio(n-), < regurgitare, regurgitate: see regurgitate.] 1. The act of regurgitating or pouring back.—2. The act of swallowing again; reabsorption.

In the lowest creatures, the distribution of crude nutriment is by slow gurgitations and regurgitations.
H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 417.

3. In med.: (a) The puking or posseting of infants. (b) The rising of solids or fluids into the mouth in the adult. (c) Specifically, the reflux through incompetent heart-valves: as, aortic regurgitation (reflux through leaking aortic valves).

reh (rā), n. [Hind.] A saline efflorescence rising to the surface and covering various extensive tracts of land in the Indo-Gangetic alluvial plain, rendering the soil worthless for cultivation. It consists chiefly of sodium sulphate mixed with more or less common salt (sodium chlorid) and sodium carbonate. It is known in the Northwest Provinces of India as reh, and further west, in the Upper Punjab, as kalar or kullar.

Those who have travelled through Northern India cannot fail to have noticed whole districts of land as white as if covered with snow, and entirely destitute of vegetation. . . . This desolation is caused by reh, which is a white flocculent efflorescence, formed of highly soluble sodium salts, which are found in almost every soil. Where the subsoil water-level is sufficiently near the surface, the strong evaporating force of the sun's heat, aided by capillary attraction, draws to the surface of the ground the water holding these salts in solution, and these compel the water, which passes off in the form of vapour, to leave behind the salts it held as a white efflorescence.
A. G. F. Eliot James, Indian Industries, p. 195.

rehabilitate (rē-hā-bil′i-tāt), v. t. [< ML. rehabilitatus, pp. of rehabilitare (> It. riabilitare = Sp. Pg. rehabilitar = OF. rehabiliter, F. réhabiliter), restore, < re-, again, + habilitare, habilitate: see habilitate.] 1. To restore to a former capacity or standing; reinstate; qualify again; restore, as a delinquent, to a former right, rank, or privilege lost or forfeited: a term drawn from the civil and canon law.

He is rehabilitated, his honour is restored, all his attainders are purged! Burke, A Regicide Peace, iv.

Assured
The justice of the court would presently Confirm her in her rights and exculpate,
Re-integrate, and rehabilitate.
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 327.

2. To reëstablish in the esteem of others or in social position lost by disgrace; restore to public respect: as, there is now a tendency to rehabilitate notorious historical personages; Lady Blank was rehabilitated by the influence of her family at court.

rehabilitation (rē-hā-bil-i-tā′shọn), n. [= OF. rehabilitation, F. réhabilitation = Sp. rehabilitación = Pg. rehabilitação = It. riabilitazione, < ML. rehabilitatio(n-), < rehabilitare, pp. rehabilitatus, rehabilitate: see rehabilitate.] The act of rehabilitating, or reinstating in a former rank, standing, or capacity; restoration to former rights; restoration to or reëstablishment in the esteem of others.

This old law-term [rehabilitate] has been gaining ground ever since it was introduced into popular discourse by Burke, to whom it may have been suggested by the French réhabiliter. Equally with its substantive, rehabilitation, it enables us to dispense with a tedious circumlocution.
F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 299, note.

rehait†, rehete†, v. t. [ME. rehaiten, rehayten, reheten, < OF. rehaitier, make joyful, < re-, again, + haitier, make joyful.] To revive; cheer; encourage; comfort.

Thane the conquerour kyndly carpede to those lordes,
Rehetede the Romaynes with realle speche.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 221.

Hym wol I comforte and rehete,
For I hope of his gold to gete.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 6509.

rehandle (rē-han′dl), v. t. [< re- + handle.] To handle or have to do with again; remodel; revise. The Academy, March 29, 1890, p. 218.

rehash (rē-hash′), v. t. [< OF. rehacher, hack or chop again, < re-, again, + hacher, chop, hash: see hash[1].] To hash anew; work up, as old material, in a new form.

rehash (rē-hash′), n. [< rehash, v.] Something hashed afresh; something concocted from materials formerly used: as, a literary rehash. [Colloq.]

I understand that Dr. G——'s speech here, the other evening, was principally a rehash of his Yreka effort.
Senator Broderick, Speech in California, Aug., 1859. [(Bartlett.)

Your finest method in her hands is only a rehash of the old mechanism. Jour. of Education, XVIII. 377.

rehead (rē-hed′), v. t. [< re- + head.] To fit or furnish with a head again, as a cask or a nail.

rehear (rē-hēr′), v. t. [< re- + hear.] To hear again; try a second time: as, to rehear a cause in a law-court. Bp. Horne, Com. on Ps. lxxxii.

rehearing (rē-hēr′ing), n. [Verbal n. of rehear, v.] A second hearing; reconsideration; especially, in law, a second hearing or trial; more specifically, a new trial in chancery, or a second argument of a motion or an appeal.

If by this decree either party thinks himself aggrieved, he may petition the chancellor for a rehearing.
Blackstone, Com., III. xxvii.

rehearsal (rē-hėr′sal), n. [Early mod. E. rehersall; < ME. rehersaille, < OF. rehearsal, rehersall, repeating, < rehercer, rehearse: see rehearse.] The act of rehearsing. (a) Repetition of the words of another.

reindeer (rān′dēr), n. [Formerly also raindeer, ranedeer; < ME. raynedere (= D. rendier = G. rennthier = Dan. rensdyr), < rein* (< Icel.) or ron, < AS. hrān, a reindeer (cf. F. renne = Sp. reno = Pg. renna, renno = It. renna, a reindeer), < Icel. hreinn = Sw. ren, a reindeer (cf. Sw. ren-ko, a female reindeer (ko = E. cow[1]), > Lapp and Finn. raingo, a reindeer); < Lapp reino, pasturage or herding of cattle, a word much associated with the use and care of the reindeer (for which the Lapp word is patso), and mistaken by the Scandinavians for the reindeer itself.] 1. A deer of the genus Rangifer or Tarandus, having horns in both sexes, and inhabiting arctic and cold temperate regions; the Cervus tarandus, Rangifer tarandus, or Tarandus rangifer.

Reindeer (Rangifer tarandus).

It has branched, recurved, round antlers, the crowns of which are more or less palmated; the antlers of the male are much larger than those of the female, and are remarkable for the size and asymmetry of the brow-antler. The body is of a thick and square form, and the legs are shorter in proportion than those of the red-deer. The size varies much according to climate: about 4 feet 6 inches may be given as the average height of a full-grown specimen. The reindeer is keen of sight and swift of foot, being capable of maintaining a speed of 9 or 10 miles an hour for a long time, and can easily draw a weight of 200 pounds, besides the sledge to which it is usually attached when used as a beast of draft. Among the Laplanders the reindeer is a substitute for the horse, the cow, and the sheep, as it furnishes food, clothing, and the means of conveyance. The caribou of North America represent several more or less distinct species, the common eastern species, or woodland caribou, being called Rangifer caribou. The American barren-ground reindeer has been described as a different species, R. grœnlandicus. See also cut under caribou.

2. In her., a stag having two sets of antlers, the one pair bending downward, and the other standing erect.—Reindeer period, the time when the reindeer flourished and was prominent in the fauna of any region, as it is now in Lapland: used chiefly with reference to Belgium and France.

M. Dupont recognizes two stages in the Palæolithic Period, one of which is called the Mammoth period, and the other, which is the more recent, the Reindeer period. These names . . . have never met with much acceptance in England, . . . for it is quite certain that the reindeer occupied Belgium and France in the so-called Mammoth period. J. Geikie, Prehistoric Europe, p. 101.

Reindeer tribe, a tribe using the reindeer, as do the Laplanders at the present time, and as the dwellers in central Europe have done in prehistoric times: used chiefly with regard to the prehistoric tribes of central France and Belgium.

reindeer-lichen (rān′dēr-lī″ken), n. Same as reindeer-moss.

reindeer-moss (rān′dēr-môs), n. A lichen, Cladonia rangiferina, which constitutes almost the sole winter food for the reindeer in high northern latitudes, where it is said to attain sometimes the height of one foot. Its nutritive properties depend chiefly on the gelatinous or starchy matter of which it is largely composed. Its taste is slightly pungent and acrid, and when boiled it forms a jelly possessing nutritive and tonic properties, and is sometimes eaten by man during scarcity of food, being powdered and mixed with flour. See Cladonia and lichen.

reinfect (rē-in-fekt′), v. t. [< OF. reinfecter; as re- + infect.] To infect again. Cotgrave.

To add new force, strength, or weight to; strengthen: as, to reinforce an argument.

A meane to supply her wants, by renforcing the causes wherein shee is impotent and defectiue.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 253.

To insure the existence of the race, she [Nature] reinforces the sexual instinct, at the risk of disorder, grief, and pain. Emerson, Old Age.

Specifically—2. (a) Milit., to strengthen with additional military or naval forces, as troops, ships, etc.

But hark! what new alarum is this same?
The French have reinforced their scatter'd men;
Then every soldier kill his prisoners.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 6. 36.

(b) To strengthen any part of an object by an additional thickness, support, or other means.

Another mode of reinforcing the lower pier is that which occurs in the nave of Laon. . . . In this case five detached monolithic shafts are grouped with the great cylinder, four of them being placed so as to support the angles of the abacus, and the fifth containing the central member of the group of vaulting shafts.
C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 66.

3†. To enforce; compel. [Rare.]

Yet twise they were repulsed backe againe,
And twise renforst backe to their ships to fly.
Spenser, F. Q., II. x. 48.

reinforce (rē-in-fōrs′), n. [< reinforce, v.] An additional thickness or support imparted to any part of an object in order to strengthen it. (a) A strengthening patch or additional thickness sewed round a cringle or eyelet-hole in a sail or tent-cover. (b) A second outer thickness of cloth, applied to those parts of trousers or breeches which come next the saddle. (c) The part of a cannon nearest to the breech, which is made stronger to resist the explosive force of the powder. The first reinforce is that which extends from the base-ring of the gun to the seat of the projectile. The second reinforce is that which is forward of the first reinforce and connects it with the chase of the gun, and from which the trunnions project laterally.—Reinforce-band, in ordnance, a flat ring or molding formed at the junction of the first and second reinforces of a gun.—Reinforce-rings, flat hoop-like moldings on the reinforces of a cannon, on the end nearest to the breech. ★See hooping and frettage.

reinforcement, reënforcement (rē-in-fōrs′-, rē-en-fōrs′ment), n. [Accom. < OF. (and F.) renforcement = It. rinforzamento; as reinforce, v., + -ment.] 1. The act of reinforcing.

He schalle telle it anon to his Conseille, or discovere it to sum men that wille make relacioun to the Emperour.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 235.

I shall never forget a story of our host Zachary, who on the relation of our perill told us another of his owne.
Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 16, 1644.

I remember to have heard an old gentleman talk of the civil wars, and in his relation give an account of a general officer. Steele, Spectator, No. 497.

2. That which is related or told; an account; narrative: formerly applied to historical narrations or geographical descriptions: as, the Jesuit Relations.

Sometime the Countrie of Strabo, to whom these our Relations are so much indebted.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 320.

Oftimes relations heertofore accounted fabulous have bin after found to contain in them many foot-steps and reliques of somthing true. Milton, Hist. Eng., i.

Political and military relations are for the greater part accounts of the ambition and violence of mankind.
Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist.

3. A character of a plurality of things; a fact concerning two or more things, especially and more properly when it is regarded as a predicate of one of the things connecting it with the others; the condition of being such and such with regard to something else: as, the relation of a citizen to the state; the relation of demand and supply. Thus, suppose a locomotive blows off steam; this fact constitutes a relation between the locomotive and the steam so far as the "blowing" is conceived to be a character of the locomotive, and another relation so far as the "being blown" is conceived as a character of the steam, and both these relations together are embraced in the same relationship, or plural fact. This latter, also often called a relation, is by logicians called the foundation of the relation. The two or more subjects or things to which the plural fact relates are termed the relates or correlates; the one which is conceived as subject is specifically termed the subject of the relation, or the relate; the others the correlates. Words naming things in their character as relates are called relatives, as father, cousin. A set of relatives referring to the same relationship according as one or another object is taken as the relate are called correlatives: such are buyer, seller, commodity, price. The logical nomenclature of relations depends on the consideration of individual relations, or relations subsisting between the individuals of a single set of correlates, as opposed to general relations, which, really or in conception, subsist between many such sets. Relations are either dual—that is, connecting couples of objects, as in the examples above—or plural—that is, connecting more than two correlates, as the relation of a buyer to the seller, the thing bought, and the price. Every individual dual relation is either a relation of a thing to itself or a relation of a thing to something else. Logical relations are those which are known from logical reflection: opposed to real relations, which are known by generalization and abstraction from ordinary observations. The chief logical relations are those of incompossibility, coexistence, identity, and otherness. Real dual relations are of five classes: (1) differences or alio-relations, being relations which nothing can bear to itself, as being greater than; (2) sibi-relations or concurrencies, being relations which nothing can bear to anything else, as self-consciousness; (3) agreements, or relations which everything bears to itself, as similarity; (4) relations which everything bears to everything else, which may be called distances; and (5) variform relations, which some things only bear to themselves, and which subsist between some pairs of things only. Other divisions of relations are important in logic, as the following. An iterative or repeating relation is such that a thing may at once be in that relation and its converse to the same or different things, as the relation of father to son, or spouse to spouse: opposed to a finial or non-repeating relation, as that of husband to wife. An equiparance or convertible relation, opposed to a disquiparance or inconvertible relation, is such that, if anything is in that relation to another, the latter is in the same relation to the former, as that of cousins. A relation which cannot subsist between two things reciprocally, as that of greater and less, may be called an irreciprocable relation, opposed to a reciprocable relation, which admits reciprocation as possible merely. A relation such that if A is so related to B, and B so related to C, then A is so related to C, is called a transitive, in opposition to an intransitive relation. A relation such that if A is so related to something else, C, there is a third thing, B, which is so related to C, and to which A is so related, is called a concatenated, in opposition to an inconcatenated relation. A relation subsisting between objects in an endless or self-returning series is called an inexhaustible, in opposition to an exhaustible relation. If there is a self-returning series, the relation is termed cyclic, in opposition to acyclic. A transitive relation such that of any two objects of a certain category one has this relation to the other may be called a linear relation; and the series of objects so formed may be called the line of the relation. According as this is continuous or discontinuous, finite or infinite, and in the latter case discretely or absolutely, these designations may be applied to the relation. According to the nominalistic (including the conceptualistic) view, a relation is a mere product of the mind. Adding to this doctrine that of the relativity of knowledge, that we know only relations, Kant reached his conclusion that things in themselves are absolutely incognizable. But most Kantian students come to deny the existence of things in themselves, and so reach an idealistic realism which holds relations to be as real as any facts. The realistic view is expressed in the dictum of Scotus that every relation without which, or a term of which, its foundation cannot be is, in the thing (realiter), identical with that foundation—that is, what really is is a fact relating to two or more things, and that fact viewed as a predicate of one of those things is the relation.

Thus is relacion rect, ryht as adiectif and substantif
A-cordeth in alle kyndes with his antecedent.
Piers Plowman (C), iv. 363.

The last sort of complex ideas is that we call relation, which consists in the consideration and comparing one idea with another. Locke, Human Understanding, ii. 12.

The only difference between relative names and any others consists in their being given in pairs; and the reason of their being given in pairs is not the existence between two things of a mystical bond called a relation and supposed to have a kind of shadowy and abstract reality, but a very simple peculiarity in the concrete fact which the two names are intended to mark.
J. S. Mill, Note to James Mill's Human Mind, xiv. 2.

In natural science, I have understood, there is nothing petty to the mind that has a large vision of relations.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, iv. 1.

Most relations are feelings of an entirely different order from the terms they relate. The relation of similarity, e. g., may equally obtain between jasmine and tuberose, or between Mr. Browning's verses and Mr. Story's; it is itself neither odorous nor poetical, and those may well be pardoned who have denied to it all sensational content whatever. W. James, Mind, XII. 13.

4. Intimate connection between facts; significant bearing of one fact upon another.

For the intent and purpose of the law
Hath full relation to the penalty,
Which here appeareth due upon the bond.
Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 248.

The word relation is commonly used in two senses considerably different from each other. Either for that quality by which two ideas are connected together in the imagination, and the one naturally introduces the other . . . ; or for that particular circumstance in which . . . we may think proper to compare them. . . . In a common way we say that "nothing can be more distant than such or such things from each other, nothing can have less relation," as if distance and relation were incompatible.
Hume, Human Nature, part i. § 5.

5. Connection by consanguinity or affinity; kinship; tie of birth or marriage; relationship.

Relations dear, and all the charities
Of father, son, and brother, first were known.
Milton, P. L., iv. 756.

6. Kindred; connection; a group of persons related by kinship. [Rare.]

He hath need of a great stock of piety who is first to provide for his own necessities, and then to give portions to a numerous relation.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 644.

7. A person connected by consanguinity or affinity; a kinsman or kinswoman; a relative.

Sir, you may spare your application,
I'm no such beast, nor his relation.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, I. vii. 60.

I am almost the nearest relation he has in the world, and am entitled to know all his dearest concerns.
Jane Austen, Pride and Prejudice, lvi.

8. In math.: (a) A ratio; proportion. (b) A connection between a number of quantities by which certain systems of values are excluded; especially, such a connection as may be expressed by a plexus of general equations.—9. In music, that connection or kinship between two tones, chords, or keys (tonalities) which makes their association with each other easy and natural. The relation of tones is perceived by the ear without analysis. Physically it probably depends upon how far the two series of upper partial tones or harmonics coincide. Thus, a given tone is closely related to its perfect fifth, because the 2d, 5th, 8th, 11th, etc., harmonics of the one are respectively identical with the 1st, 3d, 5th, 7th, etc., of the other; while for converse reasons it is hardly at all related to its minor second. Tones that have but a distant relation to each other, however, are often both closely related to a third tone, and then, particularly if they are associated together in some melodic series, like a scale, may acquire a close relation. Thus, the seventh and eighth tones of a major scale have a close relation which is indirectly harmonic, but apparently due to their habitual melodic proximity. The relation of chords depends primarily on the identity of one or more of their respective tones. Thus, a major triad is closely related to a minor triad on the same root, or to a minor triad on the minor third below itself, because in each case there are two tones in common. Thus, the tonic triad of a key is related to the dominant and subdominant triads through the identity of one of its tones with one of theirs. As with tones, chords having but a distant relation to each other may acquire a relation through their respective close relations to a third chord, especially if habitually brought together in harmonic progressions. Thus, the dominant and subdominant triads of a key have a substantial but indirect relation; and, indeed, a relation is evident between all the triads of a key. The relation of keys (tonalities) depends properly on the number of tones which they have in common; though it is often held that a key is closely connected with every key whose tonic triad is made up of its tones. Thus, a major key is most intimately related to the major keys of its dominant and subdominant and to the minor key of its submediant, because each of them differs from it by but one tone, and also to the minor keys of its mediant and supertonic, because their tonic triads are also composed of its tones. Hence a major key and the minor key of its submediant are called mutually relative (relative major and relative minor), in distinction from the tonic major and tonic minor, which are more distantly related. When carefully analyzed, the fact of relation is found to be profoundly concerned in the entire structure and development of music. It has caused the establishment of the major diatonic scale as the norm of all modern music. It is the kernel of tonality, of harmonic and melodic progression, of form in general, and of many extended forms in particular.

10. In law: (a) A fiction of law whereby, to prevent injustice, effect is given to an act done at one time as if it had been done at a previous time, it being said to have relation back to that time: as, where a deed is executed and acted on, but its delivery neglected, the law may give effect to its subsequent delivery by relation back to its date or to its execution, as may be equitable. (b) Suggestion by a relator; the statement or complaint of his grievance by one at whose instance an action or special proceeding is brought by the state to determine a question involving both public and private right.—11. In arch., the direct dependence upon one another, and upon the whole, of the different parts of a building, or members of a design.—Abelian relation, a relation expressed by certain identical linear equations given by Abel connecting roots of unity with the roots of the equation which gives the values of the elliptic functions for rational fractions of the periods.—Accidental relation, an indirect relation of A to C, constituted by A being in some relation to B, and B being in an independent relation to C. Thus, if a man throws away a date-stone, and that date-stone strikes an invisible genie, the relation of the man to the genie is an accidental one.—Actual relation. See actual.—Aggregate relation. (a) A relation resulting from a disjunctive conjunction of several relations, such that, if any of the latter are satisfied, the aggregate relation is satisfied. (b) Same as composite relation (a). [This is the signification attached to the word by Cayley, contrary to the established terminology of logic.]—Alio relation, a relation of such a nature that a thing cannot be in that relation to itself: as, being previous to.—Aptitudinal relation. See aptitudinal.—Categories of relation. See category, 1.—Composite relation. (a) A relation consisting in the simultaneous existence of several relations. (b) Same as aggregate relation (a). [This is the signification attached to the phrase by Cayley, in opposition to the usage of logicians.]—Confidential, cyclical, discriminant relation. See the adjectives.—Definite relation, a relation unlike any relation of the same relate to other correlates. [This is Kempe's nomenclature, but is objectionable. Peculiar relation would better express the idea.]—Distributively satisfied composite relation. See distributively.—Double relation, dual relation, relation between a pair of things, or between a relate and a single correlate.—Dynamic relations. See dynamic.—Enharmonic relation. See enharmonic.—Exterior relations. See exterior.—Extrinsic relation, a relation which is established between terms already existing.—False or inharmonic relation, in music. See false.—In relation to, in the characters that connect the subject with the correlate which is the object of the preposition to: as, music in relation to poetry (music in those characters that connect it with poetry).—Intrinsic relation. See intrinsic.—Involutorial relation. See involutorial.—Irregular relation, a relation not regular.—Jacobian relation, the relation expressed by equating the Jacobian to zero.—K-fold relation, a relation which reduces by k the number of independent ways in which a system of quantities may vary.—Legal relation, the aggregate of legal rights and duties characterizing one person or thing in respect to another.—Omal relation, a relation expressed by a system of linear equations. [With Legendre, omal means having the differential coefficient constantly of one sign; but Cayley uses the word as a synonym of homaloidal or linear.]—Order of a relation, in math. See order, 12.—Parametric relation, a relation involving parameters, or variables over and above the coördinates.—Plural relation, a relation between a relate and two or more correlates, as when A aims a shot, B, at C.—Predicamental relation, a relation which comes under Aristotle's category of relation.—Prime relation, a relation not resulting from the conjunction of relations alternatively satisfied.—Real relation, a relation the statement of which cannot be separated into two facts, one relating to the relate and the other to the correlate, such as the relation of Cain to Abel as his killer. For the facts that Cain killed somebody and that Abel was killed do not together make up the fact that Cain killed Abel: opposed to relation of reason.—Regular relation, a relation of definite manifoldness. [So defined by Cayley; but it would have been better to denominate this a homoplasial relation, reserving the term regular relation for one which follows one law, expressible by general equations, for all values of the coördinates—this meaning according better with that usually given to regular.]—Relation of disquiparance, a relation which confers unlike names upon relate and correlate.—Relation of equiparance, a relation which confers the same relative name upon relate and correlate: thus, the being a cousin of somebody is such a relation, for if A is cousin to B, B is cousin to A.—Relation of reason, a relation which depends upon a fact which can be stated as an aggregate of two facts (one concerning the relate, the other concerning the correlate), such that the annihilation of the relate or the correlate would destroy only one of these facts, but leave the other intact: thus, the fact that Franklin and Rumford were both scientific Americans constitutes a relationship between them with two correlative relations; but these are relations of reason, because the two facts are that Franklin was a scientific American and that Rumford was a scientific American, the first of which facts would remain true even if Rumford had never existed, and the second even if Franklin had never existed.—Resultant relation, a relation between parameters involved in a superdeterminate relation.—Self-relation. (a) A relation of such a sort that a thing can be in that relation to itself: as, being the killer of; but better (b) a relation of such a sort that nothing can be so related to anything else, as the relations of self-consciousness, self-depreciation, self-help, etc.—Superdeterminate relation, a relation whose manifoldness is as great as or greater than the number of coördinates.—Transcendental relation, a relation which does not come under Aristotle's category of relation, as cause and effect, habit and object.=Syn. 1. Narration, Recital, etc. See account.—3. Attitude, connection.—5 and 7. Relation, Relative, Connection. When applying to family affiliations, relation is used of a state or of a person, but in the latter sense relative is much better; relative is used of a person, but not of a state; connection is used with equal propriety of either person or state. Relation and relative refer to kinship by blood; connection is increasingly restricted to ties resulting from marriage.—6. Kindred, kin.

relational (rē-lā′shọn-al), a. [< relation + -al.] 1. Having relation or kindred.

We might be tempted to take these two nations for relational stems. Tooke.

2. Indicating or specifying some relation: used in contradistinction to notional: as, a relational part of speech. Pronouns, prepositions, and conjunctions are relational parts of speech.

relationality (rē-lā-shọ-nal′i-ti), n. [< relational + -ity.] The state or property of having a relational force.

But if the remarks already made on what might be called the relationality of terms have any force, it is obvious that mental tension and conscious intensity cannot be equated to each other. J. Ward, Mind, XII. 56.

relationism (rē-lā′shọn-izm), n. [< relation + -ism.] 1. The doctrine that relations have a real existence.

Relationism teaches . . . that things and relations constitute two great, distinct orders of objective reality, inseparable in existence, yet distinguishable in thought.
F. E. Abbot, Scientific Theism, Introd., ii.

2. The doctrine of the relativity of knowledge.

relationist (rē-lā′shọn-ist), n. [< relation + -ist.] 1†. A relative; a relation. Sir T. Browne. —2. An adherent of the doctrine of relationism.

relationship (rē-lā′shọn-ship), n. [< relation + -ship.] 1. The state of being related by kindred, affinity, or other alliance.

Faith is the great tie of relationship betwixt you [and Christ]. Chalmers, On Romans viii. 1 (ed. R. Carter).

Mrs. Mugford's conversation was incessant regarding the Ringwood family and Firmin's relationship to that noble house. Thackeray, Philip, xxi.

2. In music, same as relation, 8. Also called tone-relationship.

relatival (rel-a-tī′val or rel′a-tiv-al), a. [< relative + -al.] Pertaining to relative words or forms.

Conjunctions, prepositions (personal, relative, and interrogative), relatival contractions.
E. A. Abbott, Shakespearian Grammar (cited in The [Nation, Feb. 16, 1871, p. 110).

relative (rel′a-tiv), a. and n. [< ME. relatif, < OF. (and F.) relatif = Pr. relatiu = Sp. Pg. It. relativo, < LL. relativus, having reference or relation, < L. relatus, pp. of referre, refer, relate: see refer, relate.] I. a. 1. Having relation to or bearing on something; close in connection; pertinent; relevant; to the purpose.

The devil hath power
To assume a pleasing shape; yea, and perhaps . . .
Abuses me to damn me. I'll have grounds
More relative than this. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 633.

2. Not absolute or existing by itself; considered as belonging to or respecting something else; depending on or incident to relation.

Everything sustains both an absolute and a relative capacity: an absolute, as it is such a thing, endued with such a nature; and a relative, as it is a part of the universe, and so stands in such a relation to the whole.
South.

Not only simple ideas and substances, but modes also, are positive beings: though the parts of which they consist are very often relative one to another.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxvi. § 6.

Religion, it has been well observed, is something relative to us; a system of commands and promises from God towards us. J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, i. 317.

3. In gram., referring to an antecedent; introducing a dependent clause that defines or describes or modifies something else in the sentence that is called the antecedent (because it usually, though by no means always, precedes the relative): thus, he who runs may read; he lay on the spot where he fell. Pronouns and pronominal adverbs are relative, such adverbs having also the value of conjunctions. A relative word used without an antecedent, as implying in itself its antecedent, is often called a compound relative: thus, who breaks pays; I saw where he fell. Relative words are always either demonstratives or interrogatives which have acquired secondarily the relative value and use.

4. Not intelligible except in connection with something else; signifying a relation, without stating what the correlate is: thus, father, better, west, etc., are relative terms.

Profundity, in its secondary as in its primary sense, is a relative term. Macaulay, Sadler's Ref. Refuted.

5. In music, having a close melodic or harmonic relation. Thus, relative chords, in a narrow sense, the triads of a given key (tonality) having as roots the successive tones of its scale; relative keys, keys (tonalities) having several tones in common, thus affording opportunity for easy modulation back and forth, or, more narrowly, keys whose tonic triads are relative chords of each other; relative major, relative minor, a major key and the minor key of its submediant regarded with respect to each other. Also related, parallel. See cut under chord, 4.—Relative beauty, beauty consisting in the adaptation of the object to its end.—Relative chronology, in geol., the geological method of computing time, as opposed to the absolute or historical method.—Relative end, ens, equilibrium. See the nouns.—Relative enunciation, an enunciation whose clauses are connected by a relative: as, "Wheresoever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together."—Relative gravity. (a) The acceleration of gravity at a station referred to that at another station, and not expressed in terms of space and time. (b) Same as specific gravity (which see, under gravity).—Relative ground of proof, a premise which itself requires proof.—Relative humidity, hypermetropia, locality. See the nouns.—Relative motion. See motion.—Relative opposites, the two terms of any dual relation.—Relative place, the place of one object as defined by the situations of other objects.—Relative pleasure or pain, a state of feeling which is pleasurable or painful by force of contrast with the state which preceded it.—Relative pronoun, proposition, etc. See the nouns.—Relative syllogism, a syllogism whose major premise is a relative enunciation: as, Where Christ is, there will also the faithful be; but Christ is in heaven; therefore there also will the faithful be.—Relative term, a term which, to become the complete name of any class, requires to be completed by the annexation of another name, generally of another class: such terms are, for example, father of, the qualities of, tangent to, identical with, man that is, etc. Strictly speaking, all adjectives are of this nature.—Relative time, the sensible measure of any part of duration by means of motion.

II. n. 1. Something considered in its relation to something else; one of two things having a certain relation.—2. A person connected by blood or affinity; especially, one allied by blood; a kinsman or kinswoman; a relation.

> Our friends and relatives stand weeping by,
> Dissolv'd in tears to see us die.
> Pomfret, Prospect of Death.

> There is no greater bugbear than a strong-willed relative in the circle of his own connections.
> Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xi.

3. In gram., a relative word; a relative pronoun or adverb. See I., 3.—4. In logic, a relative term.—Logic of relatives, that branch of formal logic which treats of relations, and reasonings concerning them. =Syn. 2. Connection, etc. See relation.

relatively (rel'a-tiv-li), adv. In a relative manner; in relation or respect to something else; with relation to each other and to other things; not absolutely; comparatively: often followed by to: as, his expenditure in charity was large relatively to his income.—Relatively identical, the same in certain respects.—Relatively prime. See prime, 7.

relativeness (rel'a-tiv-nes), n. The state of being relative or having relation.

> Therefore, while for a later period of the dialect-life of Hellas the expression "dialect" is one of peculiar relativeness, it is a justifiable term for certain aggregations of morphological and syntactical phenomena in the earlier periods of language, when dialect-relations were more sharply defined. Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 444.

★relativity (rel-a-tiv'i-ti), n. [= F. relativité, < NL. relativita(t-)s*, < LL. relativus, relative: see relative.] 1. The character of being relative; relativeness; the being of an object as it is by force of something to which it is relative. Specifically—2. Phenomenality; existence as an immediate object of the understanding or of experience; existence only in relation to a thinking mind.—The doctrine of the relativity of existence, the doctrine that the real existence of the subject, and also of the object, depends on the real relation between them. —The doctrine of the relativity of knowledge. The phrase relativity of knowledge has received divergent significations. (a) The doctrine that it is impossible to have knowledge of anything except by means of its relations to the mind, direct and indirect, cognized as relations. (b) The doctrine of phenomenalism, that only appearances can be known, and that the relations of these appearances to external substrata, if such there be, are completely incognizable. This doctrine is sometimes associated with a denial of the possibility of any knowledge of relations as such, or at least of any whose terms are not independently present together in consciousness. It would therefore better be denominated the doctrine of the impossibility of relativity of cognition. (c) The doctrine that we can only become conscious of objects in their relations to one another. This doctrine is almost universally held by psychologists.

> Relative and correlative are each thought through the other, so that in enouncing relativity as a condition of the thinkable—in other words, that thought is only of the relative—this is tantamount to saying that we think one thing only as we think two things mutually and at once; which again is equivalent to the doctrine that the absolute (the non-relative) is for us incogitable, and even inconceivable.
> Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., App. V. (e).

> When a philosopher lays great stress upon the relativity of our knowledge, it is necessary to cross-examine his writings, and compel them to disclose in which of its many degrees of meaning he understands the phrase. . . . To most of those who hold it, the difference between the Ego and the Non-ego is not one of language only, nor a formal distinction between two aspects of the same reality, but denotes two realities, each having a separate existence, and neither dependent on the other. . . . They believe that there is a real universe of "things in themselves," and that whenever there is an impression on our senses, there is a "thing in itself," which is behind the phænomenon, and is the cause of it. But as to what this thing is "in itself," we, having no organs except our senses for communicating with it, can only know what our senses tell us; and as they tell us nothing but the impression which the thing makes upon us, we do not know what it is in itself at all. . . . Of the ultimate realities, as such, we know the existence, and nothing more. . . . It is in this form that the doctrine of the relativity of knowledge is held by the greater number of those who profess to hold it, attaching any definite idea to the term.
> J. S. Mill, Examination of Hamilton, ii.

relator (rē-lā'tor), n. [< F. relateur = Sp. Pg. relator = It. relatore, < L. relator, a relater, narrator, < referre, pp. relatus, relate, etc.: see relate.] 1. Same as relater.

> When this place affords anything worth your hearing, I will be your relator. Donne, Letters, xxxi.

2. In law, a person on whose suggestion or complaint an action or special proceeding in the name of the state (his name being usually joined therewith) is brought, to try a question involving both public and private right.

relatrix (rē-lā'triks), n. [ML., fem. of relator.] In law, a female relator or petitioner. Story.

relatum (rē-lā'tum), n.; pl. relata (-tä). [ML.: see relate, n.] Same as relate.

> The Relatum and its Correlate seem to be simul naturâ.
> Grote, Aristotle, I. iii.

relax (rē-laks'), v. [< OF. (and F.) relaxer = Pr. relaxar, relachar = Sp. relajar = Pg. relaxar = It. rilassare, rilasciare, release, < L. relaxare, relax, < re-, back, + laxare, loosen, < laxus, loose: see lax[1]. Doublet of release[1].] I. trans. 1. To slacken; make more lax or less tense or rigid; loosen; make less close or firm: as, to relax a rope or cord; to relax the muscles or sinews.

> Nor served it to relax their serried files.
> Milton, P. L., vi. 599.

> The self-complacent actor, when he views . . .
> The slope of faces from the floor to th' roof . . .
> Relax'd into a universal grin. Cowper, Task, iv. 204.

2. To make less severe or rigorous; remit or abate in strictness: as, to relax a law or rule.

> The statute of mortmain was at several times relaxed by the legislature. Swift.

> His principles, though not inflexible, were not more relaxed than those of his associates and competitors.
> Macaulay, Burleigh and his Times.

3. To remit or abate in respect to attention, assiduity, effort, or labor: as, to relax study; to relax exertions or efforts.—4. To relieve from attention or effort; afford a relaxation to; unbend: as, conversation relaxes the mind of the student.—5. To abate; take away.—6. To relieve from constipation; loosen; open: as, medicines relax the bowels.—7. To set loose or free; give up or over.

> The whole number of convicts amounted to thirty, of whom sixteen were reconciled, and the remainder relaxed to the secular arm: in other words, turned over to the civil magistrate for execution. Prescott.

=Syn. 1. To loose, unbrace, weaken, enervate, debilitate. —2. To mitigate, ease.—4. To divert, recreate.

II. intrans. 1. To become loose, feeble, or languid.

> His knees relax with toil. Pope, Iliad, xxi. 309.

2. To abate in severity; become more mild or less rigorous.

> The bill has ever been petitioned against, and the mutinous were likely to go great lengths, if the Admiralty had not bought off some by money, and others by relaxing in the material points. Walpole, Letters, II. 147.

> She would not relax in her demand.
> Lamb, Imperfect Sympathies.

3. To remit in close attention; unbend.

> No man can fix so perfect an idea of that virtue [justice] as that he may not afterwards find reason to add or relax therefrom. A. Tucker, Light of Nature, II. iii. 24.

> The mind, relaxing into needful sport,
> Should turn to writers of an abler sort.
> Cowper, Retirement, l. 715.

relax† (rē-laks'), n. [< relax, v.] Relaxation.

> Labours and cares may have their relaxes and recreations. Feltham, Resolves, ii. 58.

relax† (rē-laks'), a. [= It. relasso, weary, < ML. relaxus, relaxed: see relax, v.] Relaxed; loose.

> The sinews, . . . when the southern wind bloweth, are more relax. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 381.

relaxable (rē-lak'sa-bl), a. [< relax + -able.] Capable of being relaxed or remitted.

> How, saith Ambrose, can any one dare to reckon the Holy Ghost among creatures? or who doth so render himself obnoxious that, if he derogate from a creature, he may not suppose it to be relaxable to him by some pardon?
> Barrow, Works, II. xxxiv.

★relaxant (rē-lak'sant), n. [= F. relaxant = Sp. relajante = Pg. relaxante = It. rilassante, < L. relaxan(t-)s, ppr. of relaxare, relax: see relax.] A medicine that relaxes or opens. Thomas, Med. Dict.

relaxate (rē-lak'sāt), v. t. [< L. relaxatus, pp. of relaxare, relax: see relax.] To relax. [Rare.]

> Man's body being relaxated . . . by reason of the heat of . . . Summer.
> T. Venner, Via Recta ad Vitam Longam, p. 265.

★relaxation (rē-lak-sā'shon), n. [< OF. (and F.) relaxation = Pr. relaxatio = Sp. relajación = Pg. relaxação = It. rilassazione, < L. relaxatio(n-), a relaxing, < relaxare, relax, etc.: see relax.] 1. The act of relaxing, or the state of being relaxed. (a) A diminution of tone, tension, or firmness; specifically, in pathol., a looseness; a diminution of the natural and healthy tone of parts: as, relaxation of the soft palate.

relevance (rel′ē-vans), n. [= Pg. relevancia; as relevan(t) + -ce.] Same as relevancy.

relevancy (rel′ē-van-si), n. [As relevance (see -cy).] 1†. The state of affording relief or aid.—2. The state or character of being relevant or pertinent; pertinence; applicableness; definite or obvious relation; recognizable connection.

Much I marvelled this ungainly fowl to hear discourse so plainly,
Though its answer little meaning—little relevancy bore.
Poe, The Raven.

3. In Scots law, fitness or sufficiency to bring about a decision. The relevancy of the libel, in Scots law, is the sufficiency of the matters therein stated to warrant a decree in the terms asked.

The presiding Judge next directed the counsel to plead to the relevancy: that is, to state on either part the arguments in point of law, and evidence in point of fact, against and in favour of the criminal.
Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xxii.

relevant (rel′ē-vant), a. [< OF. relevant, assisting, = Sp. Pg. relevante, raising, important, < L. relevan(t-)s, ppr. of relevare, lift up again, lighten, relieve, hence in Rom. help, assist: see relieve, and cf. levant[1].] 1. To the purpose; pertinent; applicable: as, the testimony is not relevant to the case.

Close and relevant arguments have very little hold on the passions. Sydney Smith.

2. In law, being in subject-matter germane to the controversy; conducive to the proof or disproof of a fact in issue or a pertinent hypothesis. See irrelevant.

The word relevant means that any two facts to which it is applied are so related to each other that, according to the common course of events, one, either taken by itself or in connection with other facts, proves or renders probable the past, present, or future existence of the other.
Stephen.

3. In Scots law, sufficient legally: as, a relevant plea.

The Judges . . . recorded their judgment, which bore that the indictment, if proved, was relevant to infer the pains of law: and that the defence, that the panel had communicated her situation to her sister, was a relevant defence. Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xxii.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Apposite, appropriate, suitable, fit.

relevantly (rel′ē-vant-li), adv. In a relevant manner; with relevancy.

releve†, v. A Middle English form of relieve.

reliability (rē-lī-a-bil′i-ti), n. [< reliable + -ity (see -bility).] The state or quality of being reliable; reliableness.

He bestows all the pleasures, and inspires all that ease of mind on those around him or connected with him, which perfect consistency, and (if such a word might be framed) absolute reliability, equally in small as in great concerns, cannot but inspire and bestow.
Coleridge, Biog. Lit., iii.

reliable (rē-lī′a-bl), a. [< rely[1] + -able.] That may be relied on; fit or worthy to be relied on; worthy of reliance; to be depended on; trustworthy. [This word, which involves a use of the suffix -able superficially different from its more familiar use in provable, 'that may be proved,' eatable, 'that may be eaten,' etc., has been much objected to by purists on philological grounds. The objection, however, really has no philological justification, being based on an imperfect knowledge of the history and uses of the suffix -able, or on a too narrow view of its office. Compare available, conversable, dispensable, laughable, and many other examples collected by Fitzedward Hall in his work cited below, and see -able. As a matter of usage, however, the word is shunned by many fastidious writers.]

The Emperor of Russia may have announced the restoration of monarchy as exclusively his object. This is not considered as the ultimate object, by this country, but as the best means, and most reliable pledge, of a higher object, viz. our own security, and that of Europe.
Coleridge, Essays on His Own Times, p. 296 (on a speech by Mr. Pitt (Nov. 17, 1800), as manipulated by Coleridge): [quoted in F. Hall's Adjectives in -able, p. 29.

According to General Livingston's humorous account, his own village of Elizabethtown was not much more reliable, being peopled in those agitated times by "unknown, unrecommended strangers, guilty-looking tories, and very knavish whigs." Irving. (Webster.)

He [Mr. Grote] seems to think that the reliable chronology of Greece begins before its reliable history.
Gladstone, Oxford Essays (1857), p. 49.

She [the Church] has now a direct command, and a reliable influence, over her own institutions, which was wanting in the middle ages.
J. H. Newman, Lectures and Essays on University Subjects (ed. 1859), p. 302.

Above all, the grand and only reliable security, in the last resort, against the despotism of the government, is in that case wanting—the sympathy of the army with the people. J. S. Mill, Representative Government, xvi.

The sturdy peasant . . . has become very well accustomed to that spectacle, and regards the said lord as his most reliable source of trinkgelds and other pecuniary advantages.
Leslie Stephen, Playground of Europe (1871), p. 47.

=Syn. Trustworthy, trusty.

reliableness (rē-lī′a-bl-nes), n. The state or quality of being reliable; reliability.

The number of steps in an argument does not subtract from its reliableness, if no new premises of an uncertain character are taken up by the way.
J. S. Mill, Logic (ed. 1865), I. 303.

reliably (rē-lī′a-bli), adv. In a reliable manner; so as to be relied on.

reliance (rē-lī′ans), n. [< rely[1] + -ance.] 1. The act of relying, or the state or character of being reliant; confident rest for support; confidence; dependence: as, we may have perfect reliance on the promises of God; to have reliance on the testimony of witnesses.

His days and times are past,
And my reliances on his fracted dates
Have smit my credit. Shak., T. of A., ii. 1. 22.

Who would lend to a government that prefaced its overtures for borrowing by an act which demonstrated that no reliance could be placed on the steadiness of its measures for paying? A. Hamilton, The Federalist, No. xxx.

2. Anything on which to rely; sure dependence; ground of trust.

reliant (rē-lī′ant), a. [< rely[2] + -ant.] Having or indicating reliance or confidence; confident; self-trustful: as, a reliant spirit; a reliant bearing.

Dinah was too reliant on the Divine will to attempt to achieve any end by a deceptive concealment.
George Eliot, Adam Bede, liii.

relic (rel′ik), n. [Formerly also relick, relique; < ME. relyke, relike, chiefly pl., < OF. reliques, pl., F. relique, pl. reliques = Pr. reliquias = Sp. Pg. It. reliquia = AS. reliquias, relics (also in comp. relic-gong, a going to visit relics), < L. reliquiæ, remains, relics, < relinquere (pret. reliqui, pp. relictus), leave behind: see relinquish. Cf. relict.] 1. That which remains; that which is left after the consumption, loss, or decay of the rest.

The Mouse and the Catte fell to their victualles, beeing such reliques as the olde manne had left.
Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 234.

They shew monstrous bones, the Reliques of the Whale from which Perseus freed Andromeda.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 95.

Fair Greece! sad relic of departed worth!
Byron, Childe Harold, ii. 73.

2. The body of a deceased person; a corpse, as deserted by the soul. [Usually in the plural.]

What needs my Shakspeare, for his honour'd bones,
The labour of an age in piled stones?
Or that his hallow'd reliques should be hid
Under a star-ypointing pyramid?
Milton, Epitaph on Shakspeare.

3. That which is preserved in remembrance; a memento; a souvenir; a keepsake.

His [Peter Stuyvesant's] silver-mounted wooden leg is still treasured up in the store-room as an invaluable relique. Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 466.

4. An object held in reverence or affection because connected with some sacred or beloved person deceased; specifically, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., the Gr. Ch., and some other churches, a saint's body or part of it, or an object supposed to have been connected with the life or body of Christ, of the Virgin Mary, or of some saint or martyr, and regarded therefore as a personal memorial worthy of religious veneration. Relics are of three classes: (a) the entire bodies or parts of the bodies of venerated persons, (b) objects used by them or connected with their martyrdom, and (c) objects connected with their tombs or sanctified by contact with their bodies. Relics are preserved in churches, convents, etc., to which pilgrimages are on their account frequently made. The miraculous virtues which are attributed to them are defended by such instances from Scripture as that of the miracles which were wrought by the bones of Elisha (2 Kl. xiii. 21).

The in a Chirche of Seynt Silvester ys many grett reliquis, a pece of the vesture of our blyssyd lady.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 4.

What make ye this way? we keep no relics here,
Nor holy shrines. Fletcher, Pilgrim, i. 2.

Lists of relics belonging to certain churches in this country are often to be met with in Anglo-Saxon manuscripts.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. i. 357, note.

5†. Something dear or precious.

It is a fulle noble thing
Whanne thyne eyen have metyng
With that relike precious,
Wherof they be so desirous.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 2907.

6†. A monument.

Shall we go see the reliques of this town?
Shak., T. N., iii. 3. 19.

=Syn. 4. Remains, Relics. The remains of a dead person are his corpse or his literary works; in the latter case they are, for the sake of distinction, generally called literary remains. We speak also of the remains of a feast, of a city, building, monument, etc. Relics always suggests antiquity: as, the relics of ancient sovereigns, heroes, and especially saints. The singular of relics is used; that of remains is not.

relic-knife (rel′ik-nīf), n. A knife made so as to contain the relic or supposed relic of a saint, either in a small cavity provided for the purpose in the handle, or by incorporating the relic, if a piece of bone or the like, in the decoration of the handle itself. Jour. Brit. Archæol. Ass., X. 89.

relicly† (rel′ik-li), adv. [< relic + -ly[2].] As a relic; with care such as is given to a relic. [Rare.]

As a thrifty wench scrapes kitchen-stuff,
And barrelling the droppings, and the snuff
Of wasting candles, which in thirty year,
Relicly kept, perchance buys wedding cheer.
Donne, Satires, ii.

relic-monger (rel′ik-mung″gėr), n. One who traffics in relics; hence, one who has a passion for collecting objects to serve as relics or souvenirs.

The beauty and historic interest of the heads must have tempted the senseless and unscrupulous greed of mere relic-mongers. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 302.

★relict (rel′ikt), n. and a. [< OF. relict, m., relicte, f., a widow, < L. relictus, fem. relicta, neut. relictum, left behind, pp. of relinquere, leave behind: see relic, relinquish.] I. n. 1†. One who is left or who remains; a survivor.

The eldest daughter, Frances, . . . is the sole relict of the family. B. Jonson, New Inn, Arg.

2. Specifically, a widower or widow, especially a widow.

He took to Wife the virtuous Lady Emma, the Relict of K. Ethelred. Baker, Chronicles, p. 16.

Though the relict of a man or woman hath liberty to contract new relations, yet I do not find they have liberty to cast off the old. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 84.

Who cou'd love such an unhappy Relict as I am?
Steele, Grief A-la-Mode, iii. 1.

3†. A thing left behind; a relic.

To breake the eggeshell after the meat is out, wee are taught in our childhood, and practice it all our lives, which neverthelesse is but a superstitious relict.
Sir T. Browne, Pseud. Epid. (1646), v. 21.

II. a. Left; remaining; surviving.

His Relict Lady . . . lived long in Westminster.
Fuller, Worthies, Lincoln, II. 13. (Davies.)

relict†, v. t. [< L. relictus, pp. of relinquere, leave: see relinquish.] To leave.

A vyne whoos fruite humoure wol putrifie
Pampyned [pruned] is to be by every side,
Relicte on hit oonly the croppes hie.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 186.

relicted (rē-lik′ted), a. [< L. relictus, pp. of relinquere, relinquish, leave behind (see relinquish, relict), + -ed[2].] In law, left dry, as land by the recession of the sea or other body of water.

reliction (rē-lik′shon), n. [< L. relictio(n-), a leaving behind, forsaking, < relinquere, pp. relictus, forsake, abandon: see relict, relinquish.] In law, the recession of the sea or other body of water from land; also, land thus left uncovered.

★relief (rē-lēf′), n. [< ME. releef, relefe, relef, also relif, relyf, relyve, relief, also remnants left over, relics, a basket of fragments, < OF. relef, relief, a raising, relieving, a relief, a thing raised, scraps, fragments, also raised or embossed work, relief, F. relief, relief, embossed work, = Pr. releu = Cat. relleu = Sp. relieve, a relief, relievo, embossed work, relevo, relief (milit.), = Pg. relevo, embossed work, = It. rilevo, remnants, fragments, rilievo, embossed work (see bas-relief, basso-rilievo); from the verb: see relieve.] 1. The act of relieving, or the state of being relieved; the removal, in whole or in part, of any pain, oppression, or burden, so that some ease is obtained; alleviation; succor; comfort.

Bycause it was a deserte yle, there was no thynge to be founde that myght be to our relefe, nother in vytaylles nor otherwyse, whiche discomforted vs right moche.
Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 62.

Wherever sorrow is, relief would be.
Shak., As you Like it, iii. 5. 86.

To the catalogue of pleasures may accordingly be added the pleasures of relief, or the pleasures which a man experiences when, after he has been enduring a pain of any kind for a certain time, it comes to cease, or to abate.
Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, v. 16.

2. That which mitigates or removes pain, grief, want, or other evil.

What releefe I should haue from your Colony I would satisfie and spare them (when I could) the like courtesie.
Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 80.

Pity the sorrows of a poor old man, . . .
Oh! give relief, and Heaven will bless your store.
T. Moss, Beggar's Petition.

He [James II.] . . . granted to the exiles some relief from his privy purse, and, by letters under his great seal, invited his subjects to imitate his liberality.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

3. In Great Britain, assistance given under the poor-laws to a pauper: as, to administer outdoor relief.—4. Release from a post of duty by a substitute or substitutes, who may act either permanently or temporarily; especially, the going off duty of a sentinel or guard whose place is supplied by another soldier.

For this relief, much thanks; 'tis bitter cold,
And I am sick at heart. Shak., Hamlet, i. 1. 8.

5. One who relieves another, as from a post of duty; a soldier who relieves another who is on guard; collectively, a company of soldiers who relieve others who are on guard.

Even in front of the National Palace the sentries on duty march up and down their beats in a slipshod fashion, while the relief loll about on the stone benches, smoking cigarettes and otherwise making themselves comfortable.
Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 820.

6. In sculp., arch., etc., the projection (in painting, the apparent projection) of a figure or feature from the ground or plane on which it is formed. Relief is, in general, of three kinds: high relief (alto-rilievo), low relief (basso-rilievo, bas-relief), and middle or half relief (mezzo-rilievo). The distinction lies in the degree of projection. High relief is that in which the figures project at least one half of their natural circumference from the background. In low relief the figures project but slightly from the ground, in such a manner that no part of them is entirely detached from it, as in medals, the chief effect being produced by the treatment of light and shadow. Middle or half relief is intermediate between the other two. The varieties of relief are still further distinguished as stiacciato rilievo, or very flat relief, the lowest possible relief, of which the projection in parts hardly exceeds the thickness of a sheet of paper; and cavo-rilievo, hollow relief, also called intaglio rilevato, or cœlanaglyphic sculpture, an Egyptian form of relief obtained by cutting a furrow with sloping sides around a figure previously outlined on a stone surface, leaving the highest parts of the finished work on a level with the original surface-plane. See also cut in next column, and cuts under orant, Proserpine, alto-rilievo, and bas-relief.

High Relief.—The Rondanini mask of Medusa in the Glyptothek, Munich—illustrating the late beautified type of the Gorgon.

You find the figures of many ancient coins rising up in a much more beautiful relief than those on the modern.
Addison, Ancient Medals, iii.

7. A work of art or decoration in relief of any of the varieties described above.

On each side of the door-place [of several grottos] there are rough unfinished pillars cut in the rock, which support a pediment, and over the door there is a relief of a spread eagle. Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 135.

Hollow-relief or Cavo-rilievo Sculpture.—Court of Edfu, Egypt; Ptolemaic age, 2d century B. C.

8. In her., the supposed projection of a charge from the surface of the field, represented by shading with a heavier bounding-line on the sinister side and toward the base than on the dexter side and toward the chief. Thus, if an escutcheon is divided into seven vertical stripes, alternately red and white, it would not be blazoned paly of seven gules and argent, as the rule is that paly is always of an even number, but the sinister side of three alternate stripes would be shaded to indicate relief, and the blazoning would be gules, three pallets argent, the assumption being that the pallets are in relief upon the field.

9. In phys. geog., the form of the surface of any part of the earth, considered in the most general way, and with special regard to differences of elevation: most commonly used in the name relief-map, by which is meant a geographical or geological map in which the form of the surface is expressed by elevations and depressions of the material used. Unless the scale of such relief-maps is very large, there must be considerable exaggeration, because differences of vertical elevations in nature are small as compared with superficial extent. Relief-maps are occasionally made by preparing a model of the region it is desired to exhibit, and then photographing this model under an oblique illumination. The relief of the surface is also frequently indicated on maps by various colors or by a number of tints of one color. Both hachure and contour-line maps also indicate the relief of the surface, to a greater or less extent, according to their scale and artistic perfection. Thus, the Dufour map of Switzerland, especially when photographed down to a small size, has in a very striking degree the effect of a photograph from an actual model, although in reality a hachure-map.

10. In fort., the perpendicular height of the interior crest of the parapet above the bottom of the ditch.—11. Prominence or distinctness given to anything by something presenting a contrast to it, or brought into close relation with or proximity to it; a contrast.

Here also grateful mixture of well-match'd
And sorted hues (each giving each relief,
And by contrasted beauty shining more).
Cowper, Task, iii. 634.

Miss Brooke had that kind of beauty which seems to be thrown into relief by poor dress.
George Eliot, Middlemarch, i.

12. In hunting, a note sounded on the horn on reaching home after the chase.

Now, Sir, when you come to your stately gate, as you sounded the recheat before, so now you must sound the releefe three times. Return from Parnassus (1606), ii. 5.

13†. What is picked up; fragments left; broken meat given in alms.

After dener, ther shall come all ffre sowerys, and take the relef of the mete and drynke that the fforsayde M. and shopholderis levyth. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 315.

14. In law, that which a court of justice awards to a suitor as redress for the grievance of which he complains.—15. In feudal law, a fine or composition which the heir of a tenant holding by knight's service or other tenure paid to the lord at the death of the ancestor, for the privilege of succeeding to the estate, which, on strict feudal principles, had lapsed or fallen to the lord on the death of the tenant. This relief consisted of horses, arms, money, etc., the amount of which was originally arbitrary, but afterward fixed by law. The term is still used in this sense in Scots law, being a sum exigible by a feudal superior from the heir who enters on a feu. Also called casualty of relief.

On taking up the inheritance of lands, a relief [was paid to the king]. The relief originally consisted of arms, armour and horses, and was arbitrary in amount, but was subsequently "ascertained," that is, rendered certain, by the Conqueror, and fixed at a certain quantity of arms and habiliments of war. After the assize of arms of Henry II., it was commuted for a money payment of 100*s.* for every knight's fee, and as thus fixed continued to be payable ever afterwards. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, I. 25.

Absolute relief, in fort., the height of any point of a work above the bottom of the ditch.—Alternative relief, in law, different modes of redress asked in the alternative, usually because of uncertainty as to some of the facts, or because of a discretionary power in the court to award either.—Bond of relief. See bond[1].—Constructive relief, in fort., the height of any point of a work above the plane of construction.—Conversion of relief. See conversion.—Indoor relief, accommodation in the poor-house, as distinguished from outdoor relief, the assistance given to those paupers who live outside. [Great Britain.]—Infeftment of relief. See infeftment.—Outdoor relief. See indoor relief.—Parochial relief. See parochial.—Relief Church, a body of Presbyterian dissenters in Scotland, who separated from the Established Church on account of the oppressive exercise of patronage. Thomas Gillespie, its founder, was deposed by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1752, and organized the "Presbytery of Relief" on October 22d, 1761. In 1847 the Relief and United Secession churches amalgamated, forming the United Presbyterian Church.—Relief law. See law[1].—Relief processes, those processes in mechanical or "process" engraving by which are produced plates or blocks with raised lines, capable of being printed from like type, or together with type, in an ordinary press.—Relief satiné, or satiné relief. Same as raised satin-stitch (which see, under satin-stitch).—Roman Catholic Relief Acts. See Catholic.—Specific relief, in law, action of the court directly on the person or property, as distinguished from that in which an award of damages only is made, to be collected by execution.=Syn. 1. Mitigation.—2. Help, aid, support.

relief-ful (rē-lēf'fụl), a. [< relief + -ful.] Full of relief; giving relief or ease.

Never was there a more joyous heart, . . . ready to burst its bars for relief-ful expression.
Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, III. lix.

reliefless (rē-lēf'les), a. [< relief + -less.] Destitute of relief, in any sense.

relief-map (rē-lēf'map), n. See relief, 9.

relief-perspective (rē-lēf'pėr-spek″tiv), n. The art of constructing homological figures in space, and of determining the relations of the parts of bas-reliefs, theatrical settings, etc., to make them look like nature. Every such representation refers to a fixed center of perspective and to a fixed plane of homology. The latter in a theater setting is the plane in which the actors generally stand; in a bas-relief it is the plane of life-size figures. Every natural plane is represented by a plane cutting it in a line lying in the plane of homology. Every natural point is represented by a point in the same ray from the center of perspective. The plane of homology represents itself, and the center of perspective represents itself. One other point can be taken arbitrarily to represent a given point. There is a vanishing plane, parallel to the plane of homology, which represents the portions of space at an infinite distance.

relief-valve (rē-lēf'valv), n. 1. In a steam-engine, a valve through which the water escapes into the hot-well when the delivery-valve from the pump is shut off at the boiler.—2. A safety-valve.—3. A valve for automatically admitting air to a cask when the liquid in it is withdrawn.

relief-work (rē-lēf'wėrk), n. Work in road-making, the construction of public buildings, or the like, put in hand for the purpose of affording employment to the poor in times of public distress. [Eng.]

Those . . . who believe that any employment given by the guardians on relief-works would be wasteful and injurious may find that the entire question is one of administration, and that such work proved a success in Manchester during the cotton famine. Contemporary Rev., LIII. 51.

relier (rē-lī'ėr), n. [< rely[1] + -er[1].] One who relies or places confidence.

My friends [are] no reliers on my fortunes.
Fletcher, Tamer Tamed, i. 3.

relievable (rē-lē'va-bl), a. [< relieve + -able.] Capable of being relieved; fitted to receive relief.

Neither can they, as to reparation, hold plea of things wherein the party is relievable by common law.
Sir M. Hale.

relieve (rē-lēv'), v.; pret. and pp. relieved, ppr. relieving. [Early mod. E. also releeve; < ME. releven, < OF. relever, F. relever = Pr. Sp. Pg. relevar = It. rilevare, lift up, relieve, < L. relevare, lift up, raise, make light, lighten, relieve, alleviate, lessen, ease, comfort, < re-, again, + levare, lift: see levant[1], levity, etc., and cf. relief, relevant, etc.] I. trans. 1†. To lift up; set up a second time; hence, to collect; assemble.

Supposing ever, though we sore smerte,
To be releved by him afterward.
Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 319.

That that deth doun brouhte deth shal releue.
Piers Plowman (C), xxi. 145.

2. To remove, wholly or partially, as anything that depresses, weighs down, pains, oppresses, etc.; mitigate; alleviate; lessen.

Misery . . . never relieved by any.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 708.

I cannot behold a beggar without relieving his necessities with my purse, or his soul with my prayers.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 13.

Accident in some measure relieved our embarrassment.
Goldsmith, Vicar, vii.

3. To free, wholly or partly, from pain, grief, want, anxiety, trouble, encumbrance, or anything that is considered to be an evil; give ease, comfort, or consolation to; help; aid; support; succor: as, to relieve the poor and needy.

He relieveth the fatherless and widow. Ps. cxlvi. 9.

And to remember the lady's love
That last reliev'd you out of pine.
Young Beichan and Susie Pye (Child's Ballads, IV. 8).

The pain we feel prompts us to relieve ourselves in relieving those who suffer. Burke, Sublime and Beautiful.

4. Specifically, to bring efficient help to (a besieged place); raise the siege of.

The King of Scots, with the Duke of Gloucester, about the 8th of July besieged Dreux; which agreed, if it were not relieved by the twentieth of that Month, then to surrender it. Baker, Chronicles, p. 176.

5. To release from a post, station, task, or duty by substituting another person or party; put another in the place of, or take the place of, in the performance of any duty, the bearing of any burden, or the like: as, to relieve a sentinel or guard.

Mar. Farewell, honest soldier.
Who hath relieved you?
Fran. Bernardo has my place.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 1. 17.

6. To ease of any burden, wrong, or oppression by judicial or legislative interposition, by indemnification for losses, or the like; right.—7. To give assistance to; support.

Parallels or like relations alternately relieve each other, when neither will pass asunder, yet they are plausible together. Sir T. Browne.

8. To mitigate; lessen; soften.

Not a lichen relieves the scintillating whiteness of those skeleton cliffs. Harper's Mag., LXV. 197.

9. To give relief or prominence to, literally or figuratively; hence, to give contrast to; heighten the effect or interest of, by contrast or variety.

The poet must take care not to encumber his poem with too much business; but sometimes to relieve the subject with a moral reflection.
Addison, Essay on Virgil's Georgics.

The vegetation against which the ruined colonnades are relieved consists almost wholly of almond and olive trees, . . . both enhancing the warm tints of the stone.
J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 189.

Relieving arch. Same as arch of discharge (which see, under arch[1]).—Relieving officer, in England, a salaried official appointed by the board of guardians of a poor-law union to superintend the relief of the poor in the parish or district. He receives applications for relief, inquires into facts, and ascertains whether the case is or is not within the conditions required by the law. He visits the houses of the applicants in order to pursue his inquiries, and gives immediate relief in urgent cases.—Relieving tackles. See tackle.—To relieve nature. See nature.—To relieve of, to take from; free from: said of that which is burdensome.

He shook hands with none until he had helped Miss Brown to unfurl her umbrella, [and] had relieved her of her prayer-book. Mrs. Gaskell, Cranford i.

=Syn. 2. Mitigate, Assuage, etc. (see alleviate); diminish, lighten.

II.† intrans. To rise; arise.

As soon as I might I releved up again.
Lamentation of Mary Magdalene, st. 29.

Thane relevis the renkes of the rounde table
Be the riche revare, that rynnys so faire.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 2278.

At eche tyme that he [Frolle] didde releve, he [Galashin] smote hym with his swerde to grounde, that his men wende wele that he hadde be deed. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 397.

relievement† (rē-lēv′ment), n. [= F. relèvement = Pr. relevament = It. rilevamento, < ML. relevamentum, relieving, relief, < relevare, relieve: see relieve.] The act of relieving, or the state of being relieved, in any sense; that which mitigates or lightens; relief.

His [Robert's] delay yields the King time to confirm him Friends, under-work his Enemies, and make himself strong with the English, which he did by granting relaxation of tribute, with other relievements of their doleances.
Daniel, Hist. Eng., p. 53.

★ reliever (rē-lē′vėr), n [< relieve + -er[1].] 1. One who or that which relieves or gives relief.

O welcome, my reliever;
Aristius, as thou lov'st me, ransom me.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, iii. 1.

It acts in three ways . . . (2) as a reliever of congestion.
Lancet, No. 3449, p. 3 of Adv'ts.

2. In gun., an iron ring fixed to a handle by means of a socket, which serves to disengage the searcher of a gun when one of its points is retained in a hole.—3. A garment kept for being lent out. [Slang.]

In some sweating places there is an old coat kept called the reliever, and this is borrowed by such men as have none of their own to go out in.
Kingsley, Cheap Clothes and Nasty. (Davies.)

The desire . . . relit suddenly, and glowed warm in her heart. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xviii.

religieuse (rė-lē-zhi-ėz′), n. [< F. religieuse (fem. of religieux), a religious woman, a nun, = Sp. Pg. It. fem. religiosa, < L. re-(rel-)ligiosa, fem. of religiosus, religious: see religious.] A nun.

religieux (rė-lē-zhi-ė′), n.; pl. religieux. [< F. religieux, n. and a., religious, a religious person, esp. a monk: see religious.] One who is engaged by vows to follow a certain rule of life authorized by the church; a member of a monastic order; a monk.

religion (rē-lij′ọn), n. [< ME. religiun, religioun, < OF. religium, religion, F. religion = Pr. religio, religion = Sp. religión = Pg. religião = It. religione = D. religie = G. Sw. Dan. religion, < L. religio(n-), relligio(n-), reverence toward the gods, fear of God, piety, conscientious scrupulousness, religious awe, conscientiousness, exactness; origin uncertain, being disputed by ancient writers themselves: (a) according to Cicero, < relegere, go through or over again in reading, speech, or thought ("qui omnia quæ ad cultum deorum pertinerent diligenter retractarent et tamquam relegerent sunt dicti religiosi ex relegendo, ut elegantes ex eligendo," etc.—Cicero, Nat. Deor., ii. 28, 72), whence ppr. religen(t-)s (rare), revering the gods, pious (cf. the opposite necligen(t-)s, negligent); cf. Gr. ἀλέγειν, reverence. (b) According to Servius, Lactantius, Augustine, and others, and to the common modern view, < religare, bind back, bind fast, as if 'obligation' (cf. obligation, of same radical origin), < re-, back, + ligare, bind: see ligament. (c) < relegere, the same verb as in (a) above, in the lit. sense 'gather again, collect,' as if orig. 'a collection of religious formulas.' Words of religious use are especially liable to lose their literal meanings, and to take on the aspect of sacred primitives, making it difficult to trace or impossible to prove their orig. meaning or formation.] 1. Recognition of and allegiance in manner of life to a superhuman power or superhuman powers, to whom allegiance and service are regarded as justly due.

One rising, eminent
In wise deport, spake much of right and wrong,
Of justice, of religion, truth, and peace,
And judgment from above. Milton, P. L., xi. 667.

By Religion I understand the belief and worship of Supreme Mind and Will, directing the universe and holding moral relations with human life.
J. Martineau, A Study of Religion, I. 15.

By Religion I mean the knowledge of God, of His Will, and of our duties towards Him.
J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 378.

Religion is the communion between a worshipping subject and a worshipped object—the communion of a man with what he believes to be a god.
Faiths of the World, p. 345.

2. The healthful development and right life of the spiritual nature, as contrasted with that of the mere intellectual and social powers.

For religion, pure religion, I say, standeth not in wearing of a monk's cowl, but in righteousness, justice, and well doing. Latimer, Sermons, p. 392.

Religion is Christianity, which, being too spiritual to be seen by us, doth therefore take an apparent body of good life and works, so salvation requires an honest Christian.
Donne, Letters, xxx.

Religion, if we follow the intention of human thought and human language in the use of the word, is ethics heightened, enkindled, lit up by feeling; the passage from morality to religion is made when to morality is applied emotion. M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, i.

3. Any system of faith in and worship of a divine Being or beings: as, the Christian religion; the religion of the Jews, Greeks, Hindus, or Mohammedans.

The church of Rome, they say, . . . did almost out of all religions take whatsoever had any fair and gorgeous show. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iv. 11.

After the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee. Acts xxvi. 5.

No religion binds men to be traitors.
B. Jonson, Catiline, iii. 2.

4†. The rites or services of religion; the practice of sacred rites and ceremonies.

What she was pleased to believe apt to minister to her devotions, and the religions of her pious and discerning soul. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 756.

The invisible
Glory of him that made them to transform Oft to the image of a brute adorn'd
With gay religions full of pomp and gold.

Established religion, that form of religion in a country which is recognized and sanctioned by the state. See establishment, 6.—Evidences of revealed religion. See evidences of Christianity, under Christianity.—Experimental religion. See experimental.—Natural religion, that knowledge of and reverent feeling toward God, and that knowledge and practice of our duties toward our fellow-men, which is based on and derived from nature, apart from revelation.—Religion of Humanity. See positive philosophy, under positive.—Revealed religion, that knowledge of God and right feeling toward him, and that recognition and practice of duty toward our fellow-men, which is derived from and based upon positive revelation.—To experience religion. See experience.—To get religion. See get[1].=Syn. 1. Religion, Devotion, Piety, Sanctity, Saintliness, Godliness, Holiness, Religiosity. In the subjective aspect of these words religion is the most general, as it may be also the most formal or external; in this sense it is the place of the will and character of God in the heart, so that they are the principal object of regard and the controlling influence. Devotion and piety have most of fervor. Devotion is a religion that consecrates itself, being both a close attention to God with complete inward subjection and an equal attention to the duties of religion. Piety is religion under the aspect of filial feeling and conduct, the former being the primary idea. Sanctity is generally used objectively; subjectively it is the same as holiness. Saintliness is more concrete than sanctity, more distinctly a quality of a person, likeness to a saint, ripeness for heaven. Godliness is higher than saintliness; it is likeness to God, or the endeavor to attain such likeness, fixed attention given immediately to God, especially obedience to his will and endeavor to copy his character. Holiness is the most absolute of these words; it is moral and religious wholeness, completeness, or something approaching so near to absolute freedom from sin as to make the word appropriate; it includes not only being free from sin, but refusing it and hating it for its own sake. Religiosity is not a very common nor a very euphonious word, but seems to meet a felt want by expressing a susceptibility to the sentiments of religion, awe, reverence, admiration for the teachings of religion, etc., without much disposition to obey its commands.

religionary (rē-lij′ọn-ā-ri), a. and n. [< F. religionnaire = Sp. Pg. It. religionario; as religion + -ary.] I. a. 1. Relating to religion.—2†. Pious.

He should have remained in the city of his refuge.
Num. xxxv. 28.

You dined at home;
Where would you had remain'd until this time!
Shak., C. of E., iv. 4. 69.

And fools, who came to scoff, remained to pray.
Goldsmith, Des. Vil., l. 180.

2. To continue without change as to some form, state, or quality specified: as, to remain active in business; to remain a widow.

If she depart, let her remain unmarried. 1 Cor. vii. 11.

Great and active minds cannot remain at rest.
Macaulay, Dante.

3. To endure; continue; last.

They shall perish; but thou remainest; . . . thy years shall not fail. Heb. i. 11, 12.

4. To stay behind after others have gone; be left after a part, quantity, or number has been taken away or destroyed.

And all his fugitives with all his bands shall fall by the sword, and they that remain shall be scattered.
Ezek. xvii. 21.

Hitherto
I have liv'd a servant to ambitious thoughts
And fading glories: what remains of life

Shrine of the mighty! can it be
That this is all remains of thee?
Byron, The Giaour, l. 107.

5. To be left as not included or comprised; be held in reserve; be still to be dealt with: formerly followed in some instances by a dative.

And such end, perdie, does all hem remayne
That of such falsers freendship bene fayne.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., May.

Norfolk, for thee remains a heavier doom.
Shak., Rich. II., i. 3. 148.

The easier conquest now Remains thee. Milton, P. L., vi. 38.

That a father may have some power over his children is easily granted; but that an elder brother has so over his brethren remains to be proved. Locke.

Remaining velocity. See velocity. =Syn. 1. To wait, tarry, rest, sojourn.—2. To keep.

remain (rē-mān′), n. [< remain, v.] 1†. The state of remaining; stay; abode.

A most miraculous work in this good king,
Which often, since my here-remain in England,
I have seen him do. Shak., Macbeth, iv. 3. 148.

2†. That which is left to be done.

I know your master's pleasure and he mine;
All the remain is "Welcome!"
Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 1. 87.

3. That which is left; remainder; relic: used chiefly in the plural.

Come, poor remains of friends, rest on this rock.
Shak., J. C., v. 5. 1.

Among the remains of old Rome the grandeur of the commonwealth shows itself chiefly in works that were either necessary or convenient.
Addison, Remarks on Italy, Rome.

Their small remain of life. Pope.

Of labour on the large scale, I think there is no remain as respectable as would be a common ditch for the draining of lands: unless indeed it be the Barrows, of which many are to be found all over the country.
Jefferson, Notes on Virginia (1787), p. 156.

Specifically—4. pl. That which is left of a human being after life is gone; a dead body; a corpse.

Be kind to my remains; and oh, defend,
Against your judgment, your departed friend!
Dryden, To Congreve, l. 72.

A woman or two, and three or four undertaker's men, . . . had charge of the remains, which they watched turn about. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xli.

5. pl. The productions, especially the literary works, of one who is dead; posthumous works: as, "Coleridge's Literary Remains."—Fossil remains, fossils. See fossil.—Organic remains. See organic. =Syn. 3. Scraps, fragments.—3-5. See relic.

remainder (rē-mān′dėr), n. and a. [< OF. remaindre, inf. used as a noun: see remain.] I. n. 1. That which remains; anything left after the separation, removal, destruction, or passing of a part.

As much as one sound cudgel of four foot—
You see the poor remainder—could distribute,
I made no spare, sir. Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 4. 20.

What madness moves you, matrons, to destroy
The last remainders of unhappy Troy?
Dryden, Æneid, v.

2. In math., the quantity which is left after subtraction or after any deduction; also, the part remaining over after division: thus, if 19 be divided by 4, the remainder is 3, because 19 is three more than an exact multiple of 4. In the old arithmetics called the remainer.—3. In law, a future estate so created as to take effect in possession and enjoyment after another estate (as a life-interest) is determined; a remnant of an estate in land, depending upon a particular prior estate, created at the same time, and by the same instrument, and limited to arise immediately on the determination of that estate. (Kent.) It is thus distinguished from a reversion, which is the estate which by operation of law arises in the grantor or his heirs when a limited estate created without creating also a remainder comes to an end; and distinguished also from an executory interest, which may take effect although there be no prior estate upon the termination of which it is to commence in possession. At the time when by the common law no grant could be made but by livery of seizin, a person who wished to give to another a future estate was obliged to create at the same time an intermediate estate commencing immediately, and he could limit this temporary estate by the event which he wished to fix for the commencement of the ultimate estate, which was hence called the remainder—that is, what remained after the precedent or particular estate—and was said to be supported by the precedent or particular estate. (See particular estate and executory estate, both under estate.) A remainder is vested when the event which will terminate the precedent estate is certain to happen, and the person designated to take in remainder is in existence. The fact that the person may not survive to enjoy the estate, or that others may come into existence who will also answer the designation and therefore be entitled to share it with him, does not prevent the remainder from being deemed vested meanwhile.

With Julius Caesar, Decimus Brutus had obtained that interest, as he set him down in his testament for heir in remainder after his nephew. Bacon, Friendship (ed. 1887).

4. In the publishing trade, that which remains of an edition the sale of which has practically ceased, and which is sold out at a reduced price.

In 1843 he felt strong enough to start as a publisher in Soho Square, his main dealings before this having been in remainders, and his one solitary publication a failure.
Athenæum, No. 3191, p. 850.

Contingent remainder, in law, a remainder which is not vested. The epithets contingent and vested are, however, often loosely used to indicate the distinction between remainders of which the enjoyment is in any way contingent and others.—Cross remainder, in law, that state of affairs in which each of two grantees or devisees has reciprocally a remainder in the property in which a particular estate is given to the other. Thus, if land be devised, one half to A for life with remainder to B in fee simple, and the other half to B for life with remainder to A in fee simple, these remainders are called cross remainders. Cross remainders arise on a grant to two or more as tenants in common, a particular estate being limited to each of the grantees in his share, with remainders to the other or others of them.=Syn. 1. Rest, Remainder, Remnant, Residue, Balance. Rest is the most general term; it may represent a large or a small part. Remainder and residue generally represent a comparatively small part, and remnant a part not only very small, but of little or no account. Rest may be applied to persons as freely as to things; remainder and residue only to things; but we may speak of the remainder of a party. Remnant and residue are favorite words in the Bible for rest or remainder, as in Mat. xxii. 6 and Isa. xxi. 17, but such use of them in application to persons is now antique. Balance cannot, literally or by legitimate figure, be used for rest or remainder: we say the balance of the time, week, space, party, money. It is a cant word of trade.

II.† a. Remaining; refuse; left.

As dry as the remainder biscuit
After a voyage. Shak., As you Like it, ii. 7. 39.

remainder-man (rē-mān′dėr-man), n. In law, one who has an estate after a particular estate is determined.

remainer (rē-mā′nėr), n. 1. One who remains.—2†. Same as remainder, 2.

remake (rē-māk′), v. t. [< re- + make[1].] To make anew; reconstruct.

My business is not to remake myself,
But make the absolute best of what God made.
Browning, Bishop Blougram's Apology.

Remak's fibers. See nerve-fiber.

remanation (rē-mā-nā′shon), n. [< L. remanatus, pp. of remanare, flow back, < re-, back, + manare, flow: see emanation.] The act of returning, as to its source; the state of being reabsorbed; reabsorption. [Rare.]

remand (rē-mand′), v. t. [< late ME. remanden, < OF. remander, send for again, F. remander = Sp. remandar, order several times, = It. rimandare, < L. remandare, send back word, < re-, back, + mandare, enjoin, send word: see mandate.] 1. To send, call, or order back: as, to remand an officer from a distant place.

When a prisoner first leaves his cell he cannot bear the light of day. . . . But the remedy is, not to remand him into his dungeon, but to accustom him to the rays of the sun. Macaulay, Milton.

The ethical writer is not likely to remand to Psychology proper the analysis of Conscience.
A. Bain, Mind, XIII. 536.

2. In law, to send back, as a prisoner, on refusing his application to be discharged, or a cause from an appellate court to the court of original jurisdiction.

Morgan is sent back into Custody, whither also I am remanded. Smollett, Roderick Random, xxx., Contents.

remand (rē-mand′), n. [< remand, v.] The state of being remanded, recommitted, or held over; the act of remanding.

He will probably apply for a series of remands from time to time, until the case is more complete.
Dickens, Bleak House, lii.

remandment (rē-mand′ment), n. [< remand + -ment.] The act of remanding.

remanence (rem′a-nens), n. [< remanen(t) + -ce.] 1. The state or quality of being remanent; continuance; permanence.

Neither St. Augustin nor Calvin denied the remanence of the will in the fallen spirit. Coleridge.

2†. That which remains; a residuum.

This salt is a volatile one, and requires no strong heat to make it sublime into finely figured crystals without a remanence at the bottom. Boyle, Works, III. 81.

remanency† (rem'a-nen-si), n. [As remanence (see -cy).] Same as remanence. Jer. Taylor, ★Works (ed. 1835), II. 392.

remanent (rem'a-nent), a. and n. [I. a. < L. remanen(t-)s, ppr. of remanere, remain: see remain. II. n. < ME. remanent, remanant, remenant, remenaunt, remelant, also syncopated remnant, remlant, < OF. remenant, remanent = Sp. remanente = It. rimanente, a remnant, residue, < L. remanen(t-)s, remaining: see I. Cf. remnant, a syncopated form of remanent.] I. a. 1. Remaining.

There is a remanent felicity in the very memory of those spiritual delights. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 251.

The residual or remanent magnetism of the electro-magnets is neutralised by the use of a second and independent coil wound in the opposite direction to the primary helix. Dredge's Electric Illumination, I., App., p. cxvii.

2. Additional; other: as, the moderator and remanent members of a church court. [Scotch.]

II.† n. The part remaining; remnant.

Her majesty bought of his executrix the remanent of the last term of three years. Bacon.

Breke as myche as thou wylle ete,
The remelant to pore thou shalle lete.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 300.

remanet (rem'a-net), n. [< L. remanere, remain: see remain.] In Eng. law, a suit standing over, or a proceeding connected with one ★which is delayed or deferred.

remanié (rē-man-i-ā'), a. [F., pp. of remanier, handle again, change, < re- + manier, handle: see manage.] Derived from an older bed: said of fossils. Sir C. Lyell.

remark[1] (rē-märk'), v. [< OF. remarquer, remerquier, F. remarquer, mark, note, heed, < re-, again, + marquer, mark: see mark[1], v. Cf. remark[2].] I. trans. 1. To observe; note in the mind; take notice of without audible expression.

Then with another humourous ruth remark'd
The lusty mowers laboring dinnerless,
And watch'd the sun blaze on the turning scythe.
Tennyson, Geraint.

He does not look as if he hated them, so far as I have remarked his expression.
O. W. Holmes, A Mortal Antipathy, xiv.

2. To express, as a thought that has occurred to the speaker or writer; utter or write by way of comment or observation.

The writer well remarks, a heart that knows
To take with gratitude what Heav'n bestows
. . . is all in all. Cowper, Hope, l. 429.

Bastian remarks that the Arabic language has the same word for epilepsy and possession by devils.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 122.

3†. To mark; point out; distinguish.

They are moved by shame, and punished by disgrace, and remarked by punishments, . . . and separated from sober persons by laws.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 683.

Offic. Hebrews, the prisoner Samson here I seek.
Chor. His manacles remark him; there he sits.
Milton, S. A., l. 1309.

II. intrans. To make observations; observe.

remark[1] (rē-märk'), n. [< OF. remarque, remerque, F. remarque (= It. rimarco, importance), < remarquer, remark: see remark[1], v.] 1. The act of remarking or taking notice; notice or observation.

The cause, tho' worth the search, may yet elude Conjecture, and remark, however shrewd.
Cowper, Table-Talk, l. 205.

2. A notice, note, or comment; an observation: as, the remarks of an advocate; the remarks made in conversation; the remarks of a critic.

Then hire a slave . . . to make remarks,
Who rules in Cornwall, or who rules in Berks: . . .
"That makes three members, this can choose a mayor."
Pope, Imit. of Horace, I. vi. 103.

3. Noticeable appearance; note.

There was a man of special grave remark.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, i. 57.

4. In line-engraving and etching: (a) A distinguishing mark or peculiarity of any kind, indicating any particular state of the plate prior to its completion. The remark may be a slight sketch made by the engraver on the margin of his plate, or it may consist merely in the absence of certain detail or features of the finished work. Thus, in a first proof of an etching the absence of retouching with the dry point, or of a final rebiting, constitutes a remark; or in a line-engraving it may consist in the presence or absence of some minor object, or of certain lines representing texture or shading, which in a later state of the plate are removed or added.

The old legend still lingers that the remarque began when some unknown etcher tried his point upon the edge of his plate just before taking his first impressions. The belief yet obtains that the remarque testifies to the etcher's supreme satisfaction with a supreme effort. But as a matter of fact the remarque has become any kind of a fanciful supplementary sketch, not necessarily appropriate, not always done by the etcher, and appearing upon a number of impressions which seem to be limited only at the will of artist or dealer. Sometimes we see 50 remarque proofs announced, and again 300.
New York Tribune, Feb. 6, 1887.

(b) A print or proof bearing or characterized by a remark; a remarked proof, or remark proof. Also written remarque. =Syn. 2. Remark, Observation, Comment, Commentary, Reflection, Note, Annotation, Gloss. A remark is brief and cursory, suggested by present circumstances and presumably without previous thought. An observation is made with some thought and care. A comment is a remark or observation bearing closely upon some situation of facts, some previous utterance, or some published work. Remark may be substituted by modesty for observation. When printed, remarks, observations, or comments may be called reflections: as, Burke's "Reflections on the Revolution in France"; when they are systematic in explanation of a work, they may be called a commentary: as, Lange's "Commentary on Matthew." A note is primarily a brief writing to help the memory; then a marginal comment: notes is sometimes used modestly for commentary: as, Barnes's "Notes on the Psalms"; Trench's "Notes on the Parables." A marginal comment is more definitely expressed by annotation. A gloss is a comment made for the purpose of explanation, especially upon a word or passage in a foreign language or a peculiar dialect.

remercie†, remercy† (rē-mėr′si), v. t. [< OF. F. remercier (= Pr. remarciar), thank, < re-, again, + mercier, thank, < merci, thanks: see mercy.] To thank.

She him remercied as the Patrone of her life.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xi. 16.

remercies†, n. pl. [< remercie, v.] Thanks.

So mildely did he, beying the conquerour, take the vnthankefulnesse of persones by hym conquered & subdued who did . . . not render thankes ne sale remercies for that thei had been let bothe safe and sounde.
Udall, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, ii. Philippos, § 7.

remercy†, v. t. See remercie.

remerge (rē-mėrj′), v. i. [< L. remergere, dip in or immerse again, < re-, again, + mergere, dip: see merge.] To merge again.

That each, who seems a separate whole,
Should move his rounds, and, fusing all
The skirts of self again, should fall
Remerging in the general Soul,
Is faith as vague as all unsweet.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, xlvii.

remeve†, v. A Middle English variant of remove.

remew†, remue†, v. t. [ME. remewen, remuen, < OF. remuer, F. remuer, move, stir, = Pr. Sp. Pg. remudar = It. rimutare, change, alter, transform, < ML. remutare, change, < L. re-, again, + mutare, change: see mew[3] and mue. The sense in ME. and OF. is appar. due in part to confusion with remove (ME. remeven, etc.).] To remove.

The hors of bras, that may nat be remewed,
It stant as it were to the ground yglewed.
Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 173.

Sette eke noon almondes but greet and newe,
And hem is best in Feveryere remewe.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 54.

remex (rē′meks), n.; pl. remiges (rem′i-jēz). [NL., < L. remex (remig-), a rower, oarsman, < remus, an oar, + agere, move.] In ornith., one of the flight-feathers; one of the large stiff quill-feathers of a bird's wing which form most of its spread and correspond to the rectrices or rudder-feathers of the tail. They are distinguished from ordinary contour-feathers by never having aftershafts, and by being almost entirely of pennaceous structure. They are divided into three series, the primaries, the secondaries, and the tertiaries or tertials, according to their seat upon the pinion, the forearm, or the upper arm. See diagram under bird[1].

remiform (rem′i-fôrm), a. [< L. remus, an oar, + forma, form.] Shaped like an oar.

remigable (rem′i-ga-bl), a. [< L. remigare, row (< remus, an oar, + agere, move), + -able.] Capable of being rowed upon; fit to float an oared boat.

Where steril remigable marshes now
Feed neighb'ring cities, and admit the plough.
Cotton, tr. of Montaigne, xxiv. (Davies.)

remiges, n. Plural of remex.

Remigia (rē-mij′i-ą), n. [NL. (Guenée, 1852), < L. remigium, a rowing: see remex.] A genus of noctuid moths, typical of the family Remigiidæ, distinguished by the vertical, moderately long palpi with the third joint lanceolate. The genus is wide-spread, and comprises about 20 species, more common in tropical America than elsewhere.

remigial (rē-mij′i-al), a. [< NL. remex (remig-) + -al.] Of or pertaining to a remex or remiges.

In this the remigial streamers do not lose their barbs.
A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., X. 712.

Remigiidæ (rem-i-jī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Guenée, 1852), < Remigia + -idæ.] A family of noctuid moths, typified by the genus Remigia, with stout bodies, and in the male sex with very hairy legs, the hind pair woolly and the tarsi densely tufted. It is a widely distributed family, comprising 7 genera. Usually written Remigidæ, and, as a subfamily, Remiginæ.

remigrate (rem′i-grāt or rē-mī′grāt), v. i. [< L. remigratus, pp. of remigrare, go back, return, < re-, back, + migrare, migrate: see migrate.] To migrate again; remove to a former place or state; return.

When the salt of tartar from which it is distilled hath retained or deprived it of the sulphurous parts of the spirit of wine, the rest, which is incomparably the greater part of the liquor, will remigrate into phlegm.
Boyle, Works, I. 499.

remigration (rem-i-grā′shon or rē-mī-grā′shon), n. [< remigrate + -ion.] Repeated migration; removal back; a migration to a place formerly occupied.

The Scots, transplanted hither, became acquainted with our customs, which, by occasional remigrations, became diffused in Scotland. Hale.

Remijia (rē-mij′i-ą), n. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1829), named from a surgeon, Remijo, who used its bark instead of cinchona.] A genus of dicotyledonous sympetalous shrubs of the family Rubiaceæ, tribe Cinchoneæ. It is characterized by a woolly and salver-shaped corolla with five valvate lobes and a smooth and enlarged throat, and by a septicidal two-celled and somewhat ovoid capsule, with numerous peltate seeds and subcordate seed-leaves. The 12 or 14 species are all natives of South America. They are shrubs or small and slender trees, with weak and almost unbranched stem, bearing opposite or whorled revolute leaves, sometimes large, thick, and coriaceous, often with very large lanceolate stipules. The flowers are rather small, white or rose-colored, and fragrant, clustered in axillary and prolonged racemes. Several species are still in medicinal use. See cuprea-bark, cupreine, and cinchonamine.

remind (rē-mīnd′), v. t. [< re- + mind[1]; appar. suggested by remember.] To put in mind; bring to the remembrance of; recall or bring to the notice of: as, to remind a person of his promise.

Where mountain, river, forest, field, and grove Remind him of his Maker's pow'r and love.
Cowper, Retirement, l. 30.

I have often to go through a distinct process of thought to remind myself that I am in New England, and not in Middle England still.
E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 170.

reminder (rē-mīn′dėr), n. [< remind + -er[1].] One who or that which reminds; anything which serves to awaken remembrance.

remindful (rē-mīnd′fûl), a. [< remind + -ful.] 1. Tending or adapted to remind; careful to remind. Southey.

The slanting light touched the crests of the clods in a newly ploughed field to her left with a vivid effect, remindful of the light-capped wavelets on an eventful bay.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 212.

2. Remembering.

Meanwhile, remindful of the convent bars,
Bianca did not watch these signs in vain.
Hood, Bianca's Dream, st. 32.

remingtonite (rem′ing-ton-īt), n. [Named after Mr. Edward Remington, at one time superintendent of the mine where it was found.] A little-known mineral occurring as a thin rose-colored coating in serpentine in Maryland. It is essentially a hydrated carbonate of cobalt.

Remington rifle. See rifle[2].

reminiscence (rem-i-nis′ens), n. [< OF. reminiscence, F. réminiscence = Pr. Sp. Pg. reminiscencia = It. reminiscenza, reminiscenzia, < LL. reminiscentiæ, pl., remembrances, < L. reminiscen(t-)s, ppr. of reminisci, remember: see reminiscent.] 1. The act or power of recollecting; recollection; the voluntary exertion of the reproductive faculty of the understanding; the recalling of the past to mind.

I cast about for all circumstances that may revive my memory or reminiscence.
Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind. (Latham.)

The reproductive faculty is governed by the laws which regulate the succession of our thoughts — the laws, as they are called, of mental association. If these laws are allowed to operate without the intervention of the will, this faculty may be called suggestion or spontaneous suggestion. Whereas, if applied under the influence of the will, it will properly obtain the name of reminiscence or recollection. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., xx.

2. That which is recollected or recalled to mind; a relation of what is recollected; a narration of past incidents, events, and characteristics within one's personal knowledge: as, the reminiscences of a quinquagenarian.

I will here mention what is the most important of all my reminiscences, viz. that in my childhood my mother was to me everything.
H. C. Robinson, Diary, Reminiscences and Correspondence, i.

3. In music, a composition which is not intended to be original in its fundamental idea, but only in its manner of treatment.=Syn. 1. Recollection, Remembrance, etc. See memory.

reminiscency† (rem-i-nis′en-si), n. [As reminiscence (see -cy).] Reminiscence.

Reminiscency, when she [the soul] searches out something that she has let slip out of her memory.
Dr. H. More, Immortal. of Soul, ii. 5.

reminiscent (rem-i-nis′ent), a. and n. [< L. reminiscen(t-)s, ppr. of reminisci, remember, < re-, again, + min-, base of me-min-isse, remember, think over, akin to men(t-)s, mind: see mental[1], mind[1], etc. Reminiscent is not connected with remember.] I. a. Having the faculty of memory; calling to mind; remembering; also, inclined to recall the past; habitually dwelling on the past.

Some other state of which we have been previously conscious, and are now reminiscent. Sir W. Hamilton.

During the earlier stages of human evolution, then, imagination, being almost exclusively reminiscent, is almost incapable of evolving new ideas.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 492.

II. n. One who calls to mind and records past events.

reminiscential (rem″i-ni-sen′shal), a. [< reminiscent + -ial.] Of or pertaining to reminiscence or recollection.

Would truth dispense, we could be content, with Plato, that knowledge were but remembrance, that intellectual acquisition were but reminiscential evocation, and new impressions but the colouring of old stamps which stood pale in the soul before.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., Pref., p. i.

At the sound of the name, no reminiscential atoms . . . stirred and marshalled themselves in my brain.
Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 90.

reminiscentially (rem″i-ni-sen′shal-i), adv. In a reminiscential manner; by way of calling to mind.

Reminiscere Sunday. [So called because the Sarum introit, taken from Ps. xxv. 6, begins with the word reminiscere (L. reminiscere, impv. of reminisci, remember: see reminiscent).] The second Sunday in Lent. Also Reminiscere.

reminiscion†, n. [Irreg. < reminisc(ent) + -ion.] Remembrance; reminiscence.

> Stir my thoughts
> With reminiscion of the spirit's promise.
> Chapman, Bussy D'Ambois, v. i.

reminiscitory (rem-i-nis′i-tō-ri), a. [< reminisc(ent) + -it-ory.] Remembering, or having to do with the memory; reminiscential. [Rare.]

> I still bore a reminiscitory spite against Mr. Job Jonson, which I was fully resolved to wreak.
> Bulwer, Pelham, lxxiii.

remiped (rem′i-ped), a. and n. [< LL. remipes, oar-footed, < L. remus, an oar, + pes (ped-) = E. foot.] I. a. Having oar-shaped feet, or feet that are used as oars; oar-footed.

II. n. A remiped animal, as a crustacean or an insect.

Remipes (rem′i-pēz), n. [NL.: see remiped.] 1. In Crustacea, a genus of crabs of the family Hippidæ. R. testudinarius is an Australian species.—2. In entom.: (a) A genus of coleopterous insects. (b) A genus of hemipterous insects.

remise (rē-mīz′), n. [< OF. remise, delivery, release, restoration, reference, remitting, etc., F. remise, a delivery, release, allowance, delay, livery (voiture de remise, a livery-carriage); cf. LL. remissa, pardon, remission; < L. remissa, fem. of remissus (> F. remis), pp. of remittere (> F. remettre), remit, release: see remit.] 1. In law, a granting back; a surrender; release, as of a claim.—2. A livery-carriage: so called (for French voiture de remise) as kept in a carriage-house, and distinguished from a fiacre or hackney-coach, which is found on a stand in the public street.

> This has made Glass for Coaches very cheap and common, so that even many of the Fiacres or Hackneys, and all the Remises, have one large Glass before.
> Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 142.

3. In fencing, a second thrust which hits the mark after the first thrust has missed, made while the fencer is extended in the lunge. In modern fencing for points the remise is discouraged, being often ignored by judges as a count, because greater elegance and fairness are obtained if the fencer returns to his guard when his first thrust has not reached, and parries the return blow of his opponent.

remise (rē-mīz′), v. t.; pret. and pp. remised, ppr. remising. [< remise, n.] 1†. To send back; remit.

> Yet think not that this Too-too-Much remises
> Ought into nought; it but the Form disguises.
> Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 2.

2. To give or grant back; release a claim to; resign or surrender by deed.

Not energetic or diligent in performance; careless in performing duty or business; not complying with engagements at all, or not in due time; negligent; dilatory; slack.

> The prince must think me tardy and remiss.
> Shak., T. and C., iv. 4. 143.

> It often happens that they who are most secure of truth on their side are most apt to be remiss and careless, and to comfort themselves with some good old sayings, as God will provide, and Truth will prevail.
> Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. i.

> Bashfulness, melancholy, timorousness, cause many of us to be too backward and remiss.
> Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 197.

2. Wanting earnestness or activity; slow; relaxed; languid.

> The water deserts the corpuscles, unless it flow with a precipitate motion; for then it hurries them out along with it, till its motion becomes more languid and remiss.
> Woodward.

=Syn. 1. Neglectful, etc. (see negligent), careless, thoughtless, inattentive, slothful, backward, behindhand.

II.† n. An act of negligence.

> Such manner of men as, by negligence of Magistrates and remisses of lawes, euery countrie breedeth great store of.
> Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie (ed. Arber), p. 55.

remissailes†, n. pl. [ME. remyssailes, < OF. remissailes* < remis, pp. of remettre, cast aside: see remiss, remit.] Leavings; scraps; pieces of refuse.

> Took those best-lov'd from worser days to come.
> Drayton, Barons' Wars, i. 11.

remissibility (rē-mis-i-bil′i-ti), n. [< remissible + -ity (see -bility).] Capability of being remitted or abated; the character of being remissible.

> This is a greater testimony of the certainty of the remissibility of our greatest sins.
> Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, v. 5.

> The eleventh and last of all the properties that seem to be requisite in a lot of punishment is that of remissibility.
> Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, xv. 25.

remissible (rē-mis′i-bl), a. [< OF. remissible, F. rémissible = Sp. remisible = Pg. remissivel = It. remissibile, < LL. remissibilis, pardonable, easy, light, < L. remittere, pp. remissus, remit, pardon: see remit, remiss.] Capable of being remitted or forgiven.

> They [papists] allow them [certain sins] to be such as deserve punishment, although such as are easily pardonable: remissible, of course, or expiable by an easy penitence.
> Feltham, Resolves, ii. 9.

remissio injuriæ (rē-mis′i-ō in-jö′ri-ē). [L.: remissio, remission; injuriæ, gen. of injuria, injury: see injury.] In Scots law, in an action of divorce for adultery, a plea implying that the pursuer has already forgiven the offense; condonation.

remission (rē-mish′on), n. [< ME. remission, remissioun, < OF. remission, F. rémission = Pr. remissio = Sp. remisión = Pg. remissão = It. remissione, rimissione, < L. remissio(n-), a sending back, relaxation, < remittere, pp. remissus, send back, remit: see remit.] The act of remitting. (a†) The act of sending back.

> The fate of her [Lot's wife] . . . gave rise to the poets' fiction of the loss of Eurydice and her remission into hell, for her husband's turning to look upon her.
> Stackhouse, Hist. Bible, iii. 1. (Latham.)

(b) The act of sending to a distant place, as money; remittance.

> The remission of a million every year to England.
> Swift, To the Abp. of Dublin, Concerning the Weavers.

(c) Abatement; a temporary subsidence, as of the force or violence of a disease or of pain, as distinguished from intermission, in which the disease leaves the patient entirely for a time.
